PREFACE

TO THE TENTH EDITION.

THE best, perhaps the only satisfactory, Editor of a law book is its Author. Only he can decide with complete freedom what should be added or changed, and how and where the original plan should be modified.

This difficulty is especially great in regard to "Smith's Compendium of Mercantile Law." From no other text book of modern times have judges oftener avowedly taken expositions of the law. Still more frequent are the instances in which important passages in judgments are paraphrases of this "Compendium." How can the desire to preserve the text be reconciled with the fact that since 1843, the date of the last Edition which Mr. J. W. Smith supervised, there has been a multitude of decisions affecting every chapter of the work, and many statutes altering or consolidating large portions of the lex mercatoria, have been passed? Three solutions were possible: to leave the text intact, and to state in notes or appendices that it no longer expresses the law; to insert in the text within brackets matter modifying it; to endeavour to alter the work according to the plan of the Author. For the two first modes much may be said, and they may be applicable to certain treatises: they seemed to me to be totally unsuited to a work whole chapters of which had been rendered obsolete by legislation. I have chosen the third mode, with a strong sense of the difficulties attending it, and of my inability to entirely overcome them.

The Author did not attempt to include all the authorities in the necessarily few pages in which he treated vast subjects; he inserted, as a rule, references to important cases only. I have done the same.

The preparation of this Edition has occupied considerable time. I have been prevented by other occupations from giving it continuous attention. This has had at least one advantage. The book has been tested in my own practice, and in that of my friends at the Bar; many alterations have been made to remove shortcomings or clear up obscure points thus disclosed.

To this Edition has been prefixed a short account of the history of Mercantile Law. Though brief, it may give information not readily procurable elsewhere.

In the Appendix will be found, it is believed, the chief statutes relative to Mercantile Law; and reference is made to some statutes of less importance.

I have received much valuable assistance from Mr. George Humphreys, Barrister-at-law, of the South Eastern Circuit. If this Edition has any merits, they are very largely due to him.

The chapter upon Bankruptcy is in the main the work of Mr. E. W. Hansell, Barrister-at-Law, of the South Eastern Circuit.

TO THE

FIRST EDITION.

THE idea of this work was suggested by Mr. Burton's Compendium of the Law of Real Property. The acknowledged utility of that book induced the Author to believe, that an attempt to compress the chief doctrines of an equally important branch of law into a Treatise of similar dimensions, might not prove altogether useless. The Mercantile Law is, is one respect, better adapted to such compression than the Law of Real Property; inasmuch as the reasons upon which the former is based can be explained more shortly than those which support the latter. The reasons upon which our Law of Real Property is founded are, generally speaking, historical; and part of history must, therefore, be recounted, in order to explain them clearly and philosophically; while the Mercantile Law is deduced from considerations of utility, the force of which the mind perceives as soon as they are pointed out to it. For instance, if a writer were desirous of explaining why a rent-service cannot be reserved in a conveyance by a subject of lands in fee simple, he would be obliged to show the feudal relations that existed between landlord and tenant, the nature of subinfeudations, and how the lord was injured by them in such his relation to his tenant;

how the statute Quia emptores was enacted to prevent the injury, in consequence of which statute, a tenure, without which no rent-service exists, cannot be raised by a conveyance from one subject to another in fee simple. In like manner, the explanation of a recovery, of a fine, of a copyhold, of an estate in ancient demesne, of a use, of a trust, would require a process of historical deduction. But when the reader is told that the drawer of a bill of exchange is discharged if timely notice be not given him of its dishonour, because, without such notice, he might lose the assets he has placed to meet it in the drawee's hands; or, that if A. holds himself out as B.'s partner, he will be liable as such, because he might else enable B. to defraud persons who had trusted him upon the faith of the apparent partnership and joint responsibility: when these reasons, and such as these, are given, every man at once perceives their cogency, and needs not to be told how, that he may know why, the law was settled on its present footing. The fitness of this subject for compression is, therefore, hardly questionable. The difficulty of compressing it is, however, extreme; the Author who attempts to do so, must continually keep in view a triple object, must aspire at once to clearness, brevity and accuracy; a combination so difficult, that its difficulty may, it is hoped, be fairly pleaded in excuse for some of the deficiencies and imperfections which the reader may discover in the following pages, and which would have been still more numerous but for the kind assistance of friends, to whom the Author takes this opportunity of returning his sincere acknowledgments.

INTRODUCTION.

WRITING in the seventeenth century of mercantile law, Sir John Davies said, "This learning is not common in our books" (a). Modern writers have said the same. In his treatise on the Law of Sale, Lord Blackburn observes, "There is no part of the history of English law more obscure than that connected with the common maxim, that the law merchant is part of the law of the land" (b). In this introduction an attempt is made to elucidate only a few of the difficulties surrounding the subject: only the outlines of it are presented. Most of the authorities made use of are mentioned in the notes; but aid has been derived from Endemann, Goldschmidt, Lastig, Gandolfo, and other writers on the history of mercantile law.

About the exact limits of mercantile law there is much difference of opinion; the division between it and other parts of the law of contract must necessarily be somewhat arbitrary. The French Code de Commerce includes commerce en général, comprising a miscellaneous group of subjects, such as partnership, commercial agency, bills of exchange, the contract of affreightment, insurance, general average, faillites et banqueroutes, and commercial jurisdiction; and the Italian Codice di Commercio and the German Handelsgesetzbuch contain similar matter. In this treatise mercantile law is understood to comprise partnership, the law of joint stock companies, agency, bills of exchange, contracts with carriers, the contract of affreightment, insurance, sale, bottomry and respondentia, debt, guaranty, stoppage in transitu, lien and bankruptcy.

(a) Concerning Impositions, c. 3 (1656.) (b) 1st ed. p. 207.

In many ancient, and even in some modern, authorities, the lex mercatoria is spoken of as a form of private international law. This language was once correct. The statement made by early writers, and repeated by Malynes, Molloy, and Blackstone, that "the law merchant is a branch of the law of nations," sometimes meant no more than that it was free from certain technical rules of the common law. But it also recorded the fact that mercantile law grew in great degree out of the transactions between different nations, and that it was, to a large extent, the earliest form of private international law. When Buller, J., spoke in Master v. Miller (a) of the lex mercatoria as "a system of equity, founded on the rules of equity, and governed, in all its parts, by plain justice and good faith;" when it was said that it was impossible that "the maritime laws of any one realm should be sufficient for the ordering of affairs and traffic of merchants" (b); that the law merchant is a law "whereof all nations do take special knowledge" (c); or that a merchant "is not bound to sue according to the law of the land, to abide the trial of twelve men" (d), there was not merely a reference to the absence of technicalities, but to the fact that the same rules of law were generally applied throughout civilized Europe. "The law merchant," says Sir John Davies, in the tract quoted above, "as it is a part of the law of nature and nations, is universal and one and the same in all countries in the world; for, as Cicero sayeth of the law of nations, Non erit alia lex Romæ, alia Athenis, alia nunc, alia posthac, sed et omnes gentes et omni tempore una lex eademque; perpetua continebit, &c., &c. (e). So may we say of the law merchant, there is not one law in England, another in France, another in Spain, another in Germany, but the same rules of reason and the like proceedings of the law merchant are observed in every nation." How far, and in what sense, the lex mercatoria is now recognized by Courts to be a species of private international law is not clear. Some judges appeal to it as if it were such, and use language similar to that cited. Others dispute the existence of any such law. When it was contended, in Lloyd v. Guibert (f), that the contract of affreightment ought to be construed with reference to "the general maritime law," Willes, J., delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, said:—

"We can understand this term in the sense of the general maritime law as administered in the English Courts, that being in truth nothing more than English law, though dealt out in somewhat different measures in the Common Law and Chancery Courts, and in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Admiralty (g); but as to any other general maritime law by which we ought to adjudicate upon the rights of a subject of a country which, by the hypothesis, does not recognise its alleged rule, we were not informed what might be its authority, its limits, or its sanction. . . . . In truth any general, much more any universal, maritime law, binding upon all nations using the highway of the sea in time of peace, except when limited as administered in some Court, is easier longed for than found."

Undoubtedly, however, there was a time when the lex mercatoria, though the law of England, was also the law of other nations, and was the law of England because it was the law of other nations. Undoubtedly, too, it was administered in a manner different from that in which the common law was administered—in a manner similar to that in which the Prætor Peregrinus administered the jus gentium.

The history of the lex mercatoria explains this peculiarity. Some parts of it were undoubtedly borrowed from the Roman law; but when, by whom, and in what circumstances it is not always possible to say. Never the law of this country, the Roman law was often referred to as a general body of doctrine, suited to supply the deficiencies of the law of every civilized country. The writers on mercantile law, here and on the Continent, sought in Roman law solutions for difficult and novel problems, and often found them. Lord Holt introduced into English law in Coggs v. Bernard (h) the whole Roman law of bailments; what he did on a large scale has often been done indirectly and less extensively. The four kinds of contract which might be formed by consent alone—sale, hiring, partnership, and mandate—cover the greater part of mercantile law. Some of the chief doctrines of partnership are to be found in Roman law. Whether dormant partners were recognized is uncertain; and the rule of English law, that each partner is the agent of the rest, seems to have been unknown. One class of partnerships—societates vectigales—to some extent resembled joint stock companies. But such associations were unknown. Their object was attained by giving to a slave a peculium, or making him an institor or magister navis. The relation of principal and agent was not unknown; the magister navis, for example, had large authority, as representing the owner. But few of the rules of agency hereafter explained are to be found in the Institutes or Digest. The law of locatio-conductio covers the whole subject of the contract of affreightment (h). The principle of general average was well understood; it is stated in the Digest in language which still holds good (i). Contracts of bottomry and respondentia were known; substantially the same rules as are now recognised were enforced (k). The modern law of salvage is substantially an application of the Roman law as to the taking possession of abandoned property.

A more important source of the lex mercatoria consisted of the collections of maritime usages and customs, or coutumiers, which were drawn up for the use of merchants and lawyers, and which acquired in the fourteenth or fifteenth centuries great authority throughout Europe. They fall into two groups—those apparently compiled in some of the chief Mediterranean ports, and those compiled for the use of merchants trading in the north of Europe. Some of them were appealed to, not merely in the countries in which they originated, but also in our Admiralty Courts and other courts in which mercantile law was administered. What is the oldest of the collections is uncertain; the data necessary to determine with certainty their age do not exist. M. Pardessus argues in favour of the greater antiquity of the laws of Trani, a city on the Adriatic Sea, which, he contends, date from the eleventh century (l). The laws of Oleron, an island situated near Bordeaux, on the west coast of France, were undoubtedly very early compiled—in the view of some authorities as early as the eleventh century—and were applied in this country (m). The maritime laws of Wisby, in Gothland, are also of an early date, though the reference in them to the contract of marine insurance indicates a somewhat later origin. A more elaborate treatise is the Consolato del Mare. Its date and origin are obscure. Azuni and several other writers argue that it was compiled in Pisa; but the most plausible theory is that it was prepared for the use of the consuls of the sea at Barcelona some time before 1400 (n). Of perhaps greater antiquity is the Tabula

(h) See D. 19. 2. 13; and as to the origin of the English law of carriers, see Nugent v. Smith, 1 C. P. D. 428; Holmes's Common Law, 180; Law Quarterly Review, June, 1889. The liability of carriers in English law is peculiar; it appears to have an origin wholly distinct from Roman law.

(l) Collection des Droits Maritimes, 5. 217.

(m) See the learned judgment of Story, J., in De Lovio v. Boit, 2 Gall. 398.

(n) Story's Miscellaneous Writings, p. 100. In the introduction to the first and subsequent editions of this work, the Consolato del Mare is described "as the first modern code of marine jurisprudence," and in a note it is said:—"This is a collection of the maritime laws of Barcelona. There is an excellent translation by M. le Professeur Boucher, published in 1808. In calling it the earliest modern code, I have followed Lord Tenterden. Mr. Justice Park, however, describes it as a compilation from the laws of Venice, Pisa, Genoa, Barcelona, Marseilles, and Amalfi, which last he states to have been published in the eleventh century, and to be the earliest modern system of marine law. See the Consolato del Mare, cited and relied on by Tindal, L. C. J., in Gould v. Oliver, 4 Bing. N. C. 134. There is an edition of the Consolato in the Inner Temple Library, which is the earliest I have seen, and which belonged to the celebrated Daines Barrington. It is a translation from Catalonian into Castilian, for the use of the people of Valencia, printed in 1539, and containing, by way of supplement, a charter granted to the merchants of Valencia by Ferdinand of Arragon. This charter regulates the election of consuls, and contains provisions regarding the payment of losses upon policies, which prove the system of marine insurance to have been then well understood at Valencia. The book concludes—'En honor y gloria de Dios todo poderoso, y de la sacratissima Virgen Maria madre cuya abogadora de los pecadores, y de los ben aventurados Santos Sant' Elmo, San Clemente, San Nicolas, San Antonio, y de las ben aventuradas Santas Santa Tecla, Santa Ursola, Santa Barbara, Santa Clara, patronos y abogados de todos los navegantes, haze fin el presente libro llamado Consolato del Mare, nuveamente traduzido de la lengua Catalana en nostro vulgar Castellano impresso en la metropolitana Cuidad de Valencia, por Francisco Diaz Romano a undias de mes de Enero anno 1539.'" It is printed with a French translation in Pardessus's Collection des Lois Maritimes, ii. 49.

Amalfitana, consisting of ordinances as to the duties of owners and managing owners of ships, and part owners. The ship is presumed to be worked by persons having a joint interest. The master takes goods on board to sell them on commission under the contract known as commenda. The practice of jettison is described (A. 48), "The master ought to take counsel with the merchants, and with their factors (fattori) if the merchants are not there personally, and with any other person who represents any of the merchants." If there be no such persons, he is to consult the greater part of the ship's company; and if the merchants oppose, he is to proceed to jettison after having held a council. The artificers' lien in building ships is recognised (A. 61.) Barratry is punished (A. 3.) There is a Court which deals with mercantile disputes (o). More elaborate treatises, based on these early collections, were subsequently compiled. The Guidon de la Mer, prepared in the sixteenth century by an unknown writer; Le Grand Routier de la Mer, the Ordinances of Louis XIV., published in 1673—1681, and commentaries on them—in particular those of Valin, Cleirac's Us et Coutumes de la Mer, 1647—Casaregis's Discursus Legales, and Pothier's treatise on Maritime Contracts of Hiring, had considerable influence in forming the Jus Maritimum. English writers, such as Molloy and Wellwood, drew largely from these foreign sources. They have been recognised as high authorities by English Courts.

Similar was the growth of marine insurance. The Ordinances of the Magistrates of Barcelona as to insurance belong to the middle of the fifteenth century. Introduced into England by the Lombards, the practice of insuring became pretty general about the close of that century. No reported decision in England is to be found before (o) The chief evidence on the subject of the antiquity of the above-named sea laws appears to be as follows:—The prevalence of a belief that, though the Wisby laws were very ancient, the Rules of Oleron were still more so (Pardessus, Lois Maritimes, i. 428); that the Hogheste Waterrecht is subsequent to the Stadtlag of Wisby; that Wisby was not before 1266 a walled city, and, as Selden argues, of little maritime consequence before that date; that whereas the Rules of Oleron indicate only commerce with and along the west coast of France, articles in the Wisby laws indicate trade which did not come into existence until the fourteenth century; that some of the articles of the Wisby laws seem borrowed from other codes or collections; that the laws of Oleron were in force in the Admiralty in England in the thirteenth century.

the reign of Elizabeth (p). Merchants disposed of such disputes in their own Courts or in some domestic forum. In order to determine such questions by a specially qualified Court, Parliament established, by 43 Eliz. c. 12, a Court or commission, consisting of the recorder, two doctors of civil law, two common lawyers, and eight "grave and discreet merchants," with full power to hear and determine all assurance cases, "in a brief and summary course, as to their discretion shall seem meet, without formalities of pleadings or proceedings." In other words, they were to administer mercantile law in the summary method peculiar to it. The Court proved of little use. The tendency of the superior Courts to draw to themselves all lucrative business was too strong. A blow at the utility of the commission was struck by the decision in Came v. Moye (q), that a judgment by the commissioners was no bar to an action at law. Prohibitions to restrain them were issued, and the Court fell into disuse. Writing in 1787, Park, J., observes that no commission had issued for many years (r).

There is another explanation of the international character of the lex mercatoria. Very much of the commerce of the Middle Ages was carried on by means of great fairs (s). In fact, by means of them almost all foreign trade was for centuries conducted. In the fairs of Champagne, the oldest of them, Besançon and Lyons in France—long the greatest of them all—Antwerp in the Low Countries, and, not least, in the fairs of Winchester and Stourbridge, in England, goods were bought and sold; orders were given and taken there; outstanding payments were made there; and there obligations to be discharged at future fairs were contracted. To these gatherings, which lasted for several days, flocked merchants from all parts of Europe. The dealings of the merchants necessitated the use of simple rules; no technical jurisprudence peculiar to any country would have been satisfactory to traders coming from many different countries. It was necessary that there should be expeditious settlements of disputes, and summary executions to enforce decisions between buyers and sellers, who were strangers to each other, and who dispersed to distant places when their transactions were over. Hence arose the market law, to which reference is often made; expanded and modified, it became a principal part of the lex mercatoria. No market could be established without the permission of the king (t); and to every market was attached, as a matter of course, a Piepoudre Court, for the purpose of swiftly deciding disputes as to contracts concluded or broken within the market. Not in England only, but in Germany, France and Italy special market courts were established. The French fairs, and particularly the foires de Champagne, had acquired by royal ordinances important privileges. The maîtres des foires and custodes nundinarum exercised jurisdiction over all the business of the fairs. Debts contracted there were privileged, in the summary character of the proceedings and execution, in preference to other debts, and the exemption from ecclesiastical prohibition of usury. Ecclesiastical censures notwithstanding, usury might be openly practised in these fairs; it need not be disguised as a sale or mortgage (u). Few of the references to the market courts state

(q) 2 Sid. 121.

(r) For that matter, few cases of insurance came before the ordinary Courts. "I am sure," says Park, J., "I rather go beyond bounds if I assert that in all our reporters, from the reign of Queen Elizabeth to the year 1756, when Lord Mansfield became Chief Justice of the King's Bench, there are sixty cases upon matters of insurance." Park on Marine Insurance, i. xliii.

(t) Marquardus (De Jure Mercotarum, l. i. c. 5) collects a mass of authorities to show that the maxim, Soll man keinen Marckt aufrichten ohne Verwilligung des Königs, was generally recognized.

(u) In the history of bills of exchange, the influence of markets is visible. Devised by Italian bankers, who were embarrassed by the difficulty in transporting coin, and by the differences in coinage, they were used for the purpose of transmitting money or settling claims at the close of the international fairs; and there many rules as to bills of exchange arose. Bills payable at subsequent dates, or, strictly speaking, promissory notes, were given in settlement of balances due; and there is authority for believing that the periods for which bills are commonly drawn were determined by the intervals between the great fairs. That the lawful holder of a bill of exchange was entitled to summary execution is one of the oldest features of bills of exchange. It has come down from the time of the Italian Campsores, who, passing from fair to fair, necessarily required expeditious fulfilment of obligations. Marquardus, one of the earliest writers of mercantile law, thus states the law: "Habent hæ literæ effectum sententiæ et rei judicatæ, quin imo et pleniorem quam ipsa sententia, qui post tres dies post quam fuit recognita, fieri potest executio realis the actual law administered in them. It was, we know, the lex mercatoria, which was, in case of doubt, determined by merchants.

et personalis." (L. 2 c. xii.)

The well-known exception to the ordinary law, that sale in market overt passes the property even in stolen goods, is obviously suitable to business transacted in fairs. The restrictions mentioned by Coke (5 Rep. 167) give emphasis to this. "If the sale," he says, "had been openly in a goldsmith's shop in London, so that anyone who stood or passed by the shop might see it, there it would change the property. But if the sale be in the shop of a goldsmith, either behind a hanging or behind a cupboard upon which his plate stands, so that one that stood or passed by the shop could not see it, it would not change the property, &c., for that is not in market overt, and none would search there for his goods."

Manifestly these restrictions were due to the fact that at a fair goods were sold at stalls, or in booths, open to the public gaze. In such circumstances the rightful owner had an opportunity of regaining his property. The judges, who in Hartop v. Hoare (Strange, 1187) decided that pawning in market overt was not protected, assigned the technical, if not absurd, reason that sale in market overt is encouraged because it is circulation of property; pawning is locking it up. The more probable explanation is, that the one transaction belonged to the ordinary business of fairs, while the other did not. The convenience of merchants attending fairs, requiring prompt delivery, with no time to make enquiries as to title, necessitated that property should, in market overt, follow possession. Causes similar to those which in modern times led to the passing of the Factors Acts—the impossibility in the hurry of commerce of always examining the title of possessors of goods or documents of title—were in operation in early times. Reasonable as to chattels, the rule is still more obviously so with respect to money and negotiable instruments which were treated as the equivalent of it. Called upon in Master v. Miller (Smith's L. C. 9th ed. i. 825) to explain the negotiability of bank notes, the judges laid stress on their being part of the circulation. If an explanation of anything, this expresses the fact that the necessities of business often make impossible inquiries into title. For a very long time it was uncertain whether on the sale of a chattel is implied a warranty of title. In Morley v. Attenborough, 3 Ex. 500, Parke, B., gave it as his opinion that, according to the old authorities, "there is by the law of England no warranty of title in the actual contract of sale any more than there is a warranty of quality." This decision has been questioned, and, as is pointed out in the Chapter on Sale, it can no longer be regarded as good law. But Baron Parke's statement of the effect of the early cases is correct, and there is force in his suggestion, that "it may be that, as in the earlier times, the chief transactions of purchase and sale were in markets and fairs, where the bonâ fide purchaser without notice obtained a good title as against all except the Crown (and afterwards a prosecutor, to whom restitution is ordered by the 21 Hen. VIII. c. 11), the common law did not annex a warranty to any contract of sale." Sale by sample has been recognized only in very modern times. Though an obvious and convenient mode of selling corn or hops, it would have been at variance with the requirements of sale in market overt. There the bulk, not merely a part of it, would be exposed to view. Nor would such a mode of selling be to the interest of the lord of the manor or other superior of the market, who, by tolerating it, might lose tolls or his dues. It might be plausibly contended—in fact, in Hill v. Smith, 4 Taunt. 520, it was so contended—that such sale is distinctly adverse to the market laws of the country. "All the doctrine of sales in market overt," said

What were its rules—whether it was other than merchants' view of what was fair and customary—is not clear. Few reports of the cases are extant (x). It is expressly stated by Fleta (y) that the law as to sale among merchants differed from that stated by Bracton; on receipt of the arra, or earnest money, the seller could not withdraw from the agreement without forfeiture of a penal sum in damages. In those courts the evidence received was different from that elsewhere. Marquardus, in his chapter de probationibus mercatorum, quæ fiunt per libros, litteras, et signa (z) shows that, in disregard of all technical rules to the contrary, the best evidence procurable in the circumstances, without loss of time or expense, was admissible. Among merchants tallies were a usual mode of proof (a). "And if it happen," say the customs of the City of London, "that between merchant and merchant, or citizen and citizen, there is a dispute as to a debt, and a tally is produced by one party, and such tally is disowned, then shall the party bringing such tally have his proof according to the law merchant: provided that such proof is made by citizens and merchants or other good and lawful men, and not by ribald persons" (b).

A peculiarity of those courts was the summary nature of their proceedings. "For contracts and injuries done concerning the fair or market," says Coke (c), "there shall be as speedy justice done for the

Sir James Mansfield, "militates against any idea of a sale by sample, for a sale in market overt requires that the commodity should be openly sold and delivered in the market."

The law of market overt may perhaps go back to a still more remote origin. The laws of Ina and Edgar require merchants to sell before witnesses, or to declare their dealings. Merewether's History of Boroughs, i. pp. 16 and 40; so, too, the so-called laws of William the Conqueror, p. 61. It was a general principle that "no one shall buy without the borough or vill without witnesses," p. 66.

(x) Marquardus (de Jure Mercatorum), the author of the first scientific treatise on the subject, enjoins judges in mercantile cases to take as their first guide equity—to decide what is fair and reasonable—and next to follow mercantile usages. advancement of trade and traffic as the dust can fall from the foot, the proceedings there being 'de hora in horam.'"

Mercantile law was also administered in the staple courts. The complete history of the staple has yet to be written. The motives, chiefly political, which led to the establishing of it are explained in Professor Schanz's Englische Handelspolitik; the actual proceedings of the staple court are almost entirely unknown (d). The general nature of the staple is best understood from the Statute of the Staple (27 Edw. III. st. 2), which directs that the staples for wool, woolsell, leather, and lead should be confined to a few towns in England—Newcastle, York, Lincoln, Norwich, Westminster, Canterbury, Chichester, Winchester, Exeter, and Bristol. The King's justices were directed not to take cognizance of things belonging to the staple. (c. 5.) Mayors were to have jurisdiction over causes connected with it; speedy and ready process was to be made from day to day and from hour to hour, according to the law of the staple,—not at common law. "No merchant," it was enacted, "shall be impleaded or impeached for another's debt, whereof he is not debtor, pledge, nor mainpernour." An alien merchant might sue in the staple courts or the Courts of common law, as he preferred (e).

One of the effects of the growth of the staple courts was to bring about an alteration in regard to levying execution. If unable to alienate his estate, or to charge it with debts, a landowner in feudal times could offer to his creditors, as security, only his chattels, generally few and of little value (f). This was altered by the Statute of Acton Burnel de Mercatoribus (g); and further changes were made by the Statute de Mercatoribus (h), and the Statute of the Staple (i). The effect of these enactments was to provide a summary and effective execution in mercantile cases. If a debtor acknowledged his debt, and entered into his recognizances before the mayor, his chattels and devisable burgages, to the amount of the debt, might, in the event of failure to pay, be forthwith sold. The preamble of the statute refers to the hardships of merchants; the operative words extend to all persons, except Jews. When the staple was established by Edward III. it was thought proper to give merchants connected with the staple the same security as that furnished by statute merchant. Hence the well-known security of statute staple, consisting of recognizance taken before the mayor of the staple (k). In course of time persons who had nothing to do with the staple availed themselves of this useful security. This was prohibited by the 23 Henry VIII.; but a similar statutory security, known as recognizance in the nature of a statute staple, was created (l). The Statute of Staples made provisions for the trial of disputes to which foreign merchants were parties. Among them was one to the effect that if the parties were aliens, the inquest was to be tried by aliens; if both parties denizens, by denizens. If the one party were a denizen and the other an alien, the jury was to consist half of denizens and half of aliens: the origin, it may be observed, of mixed juries (m).

The importance of the presence of foreign merchants, in particular the Teutonic Hanse Guild, is not to be lost sight of. They obtained many privileges from English kings, who protected them against the hatred and jealousy of the City (n). The statute book and many charters bear testimony to their importance. The Carta Mercatoria of the reign of Edward I. granted as a favour to foreign merchants that "every contract between said merchants and any persons, whensoever they may come, touching any kind of merchandise, shall be firm and stable, so that neither of the said merchants shall be able to retract or resile from the said contract when once the God's penny shall have been given and received between the parties to the contract;" and, similar words, it is pointed out,

"Item, volumus et concedimus," proceeds this charter, "quod aliquis certus homo fidelis et discretus London. residens assignetur Justiciarius Mercatoribus memoratis, coram quo valeant specialiter placitare et debita sua recuperare celeriter, si vicecomites et majores eis non facerent de die in diem celeris justiciæ complementum; et inde fiat commissio extra cartam presentem concessa mercatoribus antedictis, scilicet de hiis quæ sunt inter mercatores et mercatores, secundum legem mercatoriam, deducenda (p).

Prynne (q) mentions commissions of a still earlier date, to inquire into depredations and robberies of merchants on sea, and to afford them redress according to the lex mercatoria or the lex maritima. Jews, too, had their special justiciaries, with jurisdiction over pleas as to contracts affecting their lands or chattels; they, too, appear to have acted independently of the common law (r). Where and when foreign merchants first obtained such privileges is unknown. Miltiz, in his Manuel des Consuls, says, that the first traces of such a special magistracy are to be found in the laws of the Visigoths, which provide for the disputes of foreign merchants being tried before their telonarii, the equivalents of the prætor peregrinus (s). Whether that is correct may be doubted; but it is certain that as early as the twelfth century, in Italy, France, Spain, Germany, and, in fact, wherever commerce flourished, special Courts existed for the trial of mercantile cases (t).

(t) Prynne (Animadversions, 175) observes (referring to the Court of the Mayor of the Staple):—There "is strong evidence that the common law and judges never had any ancient lawful jurisdiction of charter-parties or contracts made between merchants or mariners, for merchandise, staple commodities, or freights beyond the sea, since they had no ancient legal jurisdiction over such charter-parties and contracts, though made in staple towns or fairs within the realm." Story, J., states in De Lovio v. Boit, 2 Gall. 466, as the result of his examination of the authorities as to the jurisdiction

The Admiralty Court, too, administered mercantile law. An ordinance made at Hastings by Edward I. declared that any contract made between merchants or mariners beyond seas or within the flood mark should be tried before the Admiral, and not elsewhere (t). To such matters the Admiralty Court applied, not the common law, but the principles of the civil law and such of the sea laws, the rude codes of the time, as seemed in point. When a contract made abroad was the subject of dispute, the Court offered many advantages. Not only were charter parties construed in the light of laws which accorded with the customs of the litigants, the remedies in rem which the Court granted were useful. It admitted in evidence copies of instruments, a point obviously of importance when the originals happened to be abroad and could not be produced. It possessed powers unknown to the common law of granting commissions; powers particularly valuable in disputes as to policies of insurance, over which the Admiralty claimed jurisdiction. Causes were determined expeditiously, not from term to term, but after the fashion of the lex mercatoria, from day to day and tide to tide; and the Court sat, in case of necessity, on Sundays and feast days. "Nothing," says Sir Leoline Jenkyns, "can be more pernicious to seafaring and trading men than delay in their law suits, and therefore every maritime country in Christendom had a separate jurisdiction for differences among merchants and seafaring men: so had we once. We had a law merchant, and by it the proceedings were de die in diem. We have yet left the form of a Court of Admiralty, and are wont by it to proceed not only de die in diem, or as summary as a judgment de jure gentium can be, but from tide to tide" (u).

This jurisdiction was not acquiesced in, and its extent fluctuated from time to time accordingly. The admiral and his officers held of the Admiralty:—"(1) That the jurisdiction of the Admiralty until the statutes of Richard II. extended to all maritime contracts, whether executed at home or abroad, and to all torts, injuries, and offences, on the high seas, and in ports and havens, as far as the ebb and flow of the tide. (2) That the common law interpretation of these statutes abridges this jurisdiction to things wholly and exclusively done upon the sea."

pleas of contracts arising not merely on the sea, but within the bodies of counties, and as to matters not strictly maritime; an exercise of jurisdiction which was resented. The history of the conflict between the Admiralty Court and the Courts of Common Law in Coke's time is well known. From time to time statutes were passed to restrain the encroachments of the former. A formal agreement come to in 1575, between the common law judges and the Admiralty Court, brought about a pause in the struggle; another agreement was come to in 1633. By Lord Hobart's decision in Bridgman's case (u) the cognizance of contracts made at sea, but not for or in respect of maritime matters, was withdrawn from the Admiralty Court. By fictitious allegations that contracts really made at sea were made at the Royal Exchange, actions on charter-parties were brought within the purview of the Courts of Common Law. The charters of several towns granted as a special favour exemption from the jurisdiction of the Admiralty. In the treaties between England and the Hanseatic Towns it was specially stipulated that no sailor or merchant of the Hanse should be expected to endure Admiralty jurisdiction.

Thus the saying that the lex mercatoria was a part of the jus gentium was in a sense true. Even in the thirteenth and fourteenth century it was in force. A part of it existed in the form of codes or collections of laws generally observed; separate Courts administered it. In England some of these Courts fell into disuse. They were subject to the prohibitions issued by the Superior Courts. The fact that in the Piepoudre Courts plaintiffs must swear that the cause of action arose within their jurisdiction, seriously impaired their power (v).

In the Year Books and earliest reports are to be found a considerable number of cases relating to customs. They increase in the reports of the times of Elizabeth and James I. The term "custom" is misleading. It really meant often the laws of local Courts. What the superior Courts treated as "customs," the local Courts administered as the lex mercatoria. Rejecting some local laws, affirming others, condemning some as unreasonable, approving others, the King's Courts par excellence did much to put an end to the diversity of usages. Viewed as customs, local laws were subjected to certain tests which were not always satisfied; e. g., the test whether they were reasonable, certain, and not arbitrary. Some of these customs stood this test, and survived. Molloy (x), enumerating in 1682 the peculiar rights of merchants, mentions the right of survivorship in the case of partners (jus accrescendi non inter mercatores), the right of suing upon negotiable instruments, and the right to trade marks (y). Sir John Davies, writing about the same time (z), enumerates the following differences between the law merchant and the common law:—If two merchants were joint owners or partners in merchandize acquired by a joint contract, the one might have an action of account against the other; the jus accrescendi did not hold good as to mercantile transactions; the goods of ecclesiastical persons, which by the common law were discharged of tolls, were subject to them; an English merchant spoiled of his merchandize upon the seas or beyond the sea by the subject of the foreign king might have a writ of reprisal against all the subjects of that nation; in an action for debt upon a simple contract the defendant might not urge his law, that is, bar the plaintiff by taking an oath that he does not owe the debt or any part of it; and "lastly, in a sute at the common law no man's writings can be pleaded against him as his act and deed, unless the same be sealed and delivered; but in a sute between merchants, bills of lading, bills of exchange, being but tickets without seals, letters of advice and credences, policies of assurance, assignations of debt, all which are of no force at the common law, are of good credit and force by the law merchant."

Some of these rules are still in force; others have been pronounced illegal and invalid.

One or two illustrations of this sifting process may be given. It was the custom in many towns—indeed, it seems the survival of an old law, at one time universal, of burgschaft or frankpledge—to hold inhabitants of the same town or country liable for the debts of their fellow townsmen or fellow countrymen (a). Independently of any contract, they were regarded as sureties for each other. If one of them failed to pay a debt, the mayor of the town in which he had contracted it wrote to the mayor of the debtor's town requesting the municipal authorities to procure satisfaction. If it were not given, the goods of any person belonging to the latter town, or which might happen to come within the jurisdiction of the inferior courts, were seized. It was convenient where trade was carried on by foreign guilds. It was altered by the Statute of Westminster so far as English merchants were concerned (b). In treaties it was common to stipulate that this custom should be excluded (c). But it was revived in the case of the Lombard merchants in the reign of Edward III., and it lingered as a custom in many towns. Foreign attachment, such as lately existed in the Lord Mayor's Court, was the survival of an institution once important. In Paramore v. Verrall (cc), the validity of a somewhat similar custom at Sandwich was disputed. It differed from the custom above described chiefly in the fact that the corporation of Sandwich might retain the body of any "foreigner" until satisfaction was made. The validity of the practice having been solemnly argued, it was disallowed by the Courts (d).

Another singular custom disappeared. It is clear from many authorities that there existed a well-recognized custom by which any person might claim the profits of a bargain made in his presence.

Abridg. 554; Bowser v. Collins, 22; Davies, Concerning Impositione, c. 3; Remembrancia of the City of London, p. 439, where is a letter from the Earl of Southampton, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, to the Lord Mayor of London, remonstrating with the freemen of London for trying to dispute the validity of the custom of withernam—a custom which had been decided sixteen years before against the Cinque Ports as to the body of a debtor, and in their favour as to his goods.

"The freemen of Rye," says the custumal of that town, "were wont or ought to be partners in all manner of merchandise where they are in presence at the buying or selling of it, if they will claim any part, unless the buyer or seller can allege sufficient cause why he that so claimeth to have part in the said merchandise is not worthy to have part" (e).

But for this sifting process, destructive to much of the old mercantile law, we might have had in England pays coutumier, or districts subject to customary laws, such as existed in France before the Revolution. By accident is due the survival of such peculiarities as the partnership or company law administered in the Stannaries Courts (f).

Another influence must be here named. Before the close of the fourteenth century there were no English writers on mercantile law, and few, if any, such writers appear in the fifteenth century. On the Continent, especially in Italy, it was different. In France and Germany the usages of merchants early formed the subject of a large literature. Pegolotti's Practica della Mercatura dates from 1343; Uzzano's work, bearing the same title, from 1442. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries such works abound (g). Benvenutus Straccha (de Mercatura about 1550), Sigismundus Scaccia (1618), the Patronus Mercatorum, as he was called, Raphael de Turri (1661), Marquardus (1662), and many other writers, composed elaborate treatises on all branches of mercantile usages and law, when, so far as the existing reports enable us to judge, there were no English decisions on the subject. Especially complete was the Continental literature relating to bills of exchange. Translations or adaptations of some of these treatises were published in England in the seventeenth century; a large number of works, partly devoted to the description of usages of merchants, partly to the solution of legal problems, were then published. The works of Malynes, Marius, Molloy and Beawes, published in the seventeenth century, are adaptations, in parts little more than translations, of the writings of Italian and German writers. All of these writers insist that the lex mercatoria is a universal law. "I have entitled the book," said Malynes in the preface (1622) to his Lex Mercatoria, "according to the ancient name of lex mercatoria, and not jus mercatorum, because it is a customary law, approved by the authority of all kingdoms and commonwealths, and not a law established by the sovereignty of any prince, either in the first foundations, or by continuance of time." All of these writers regard merchants as a class apart, subject to a separate law; a true kaufmannsstand exists. A lawyer of the reign of Edward III., and one of the reign of Elizabeth or Charles II., would have admitted that the law of merchants is part of the law of the land. But they would not have understood the maxim in the same sense. Neither of them would have understood it in the sense in which it is now used. If always true, that maxim has not always been true in the same sense.

This may be illustrated by reference to bills of exchange. The books contain decisions that in suing upon a bill of exchange it was once necessary to allege that the acceptor or drawer was a merchant. As late as the reign of William and Mary the Court of King's Bench, in an action against the drawer of a bill of exchange, upheld a special plea that he was a "gentleman," and not a trader. This was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber (g). By the end of the 17th century it was settled that proof of trading was not necessary. The existence of a transition stage is indicated in the remarks made in certain judgments, that a person who drew a bill of exchange "made himself a merchant within the custom." In Bromwich v. Loyd (h), Treby, C. J., thus describes the fluctuating course of (g) Sarsfield v. Witherly, Carthew, 82.

(h) 2 Lut. 1582. See the history of the decisions in Goodwin v. Robarts, L. R. 10 Ex. p. 348. The following cases show the changing language of the Courts in regard to mercantile law. In Pierson v. Pounteys, Yelverton, 135 (1609), the Court says, "The judges ought to take notice of that which is used among merchants." In Vanheath v. Turner, Winch's Reports, 24 (1622), Hobart, C. J., says, "The custom of merchants is part of the common law of the kingdom, of which judges ought to take notice: and if any doubts arise to them about their customs, they may send for the merchants to know their customs." There was considerable controversy whether the custom of merchants decisions:—"Bills of exchange at first were extended only to merchant strangers trafficking with English merchants, and afterwards to inland bills between merchants trafficking with one another here in England, and then to all persons trafficking, and subsequently to all persons trafficking or not." Even in comparatively modern times it was customary in actions on bills of exchange to allege in the declaration that the plaintiff sued "according to the custom," and that the parties were "residing, trading, and using commerce within this kingdom" (i).

The history of mercantile law may be roughly divided into three periods: First, a time when mercantile law, so far as it existed, was administered in special Courts, and for the purpose of settling the disputes of a special class, subject to peculiar duties and possessed of peculiar rights; a second period, in which mercantile law chiefly consisted of a body of customs, to be proved, in case of doubt, as facts, and binding only upon a special class; a third period, in which these customs are incorporated in the general law, and are binding upon all, whether merchants or not (j). Another division may be suggested. The first period extends to the appointment of Coke as Chief Justice; the second, from that event to the appointment of Lord Mansfield as Chief Justice, in May, 1756; and the last, from that date to the present time (k).

Lord Mansfield made a great change in regard to commercial law. Some of his chief services related to procedure. The use of the consolidation rule in insurance cases, a limitation of the practice of giving general verdicts in commercial cases, and of reserving cases, the abandonment of the practice of hearing two arguments, and, above all, applied to mercantile contracts not made between merchants: Oaste v. Taylor, Cro. Jac. 306 (1613); Eaglechilde's case, Hetley, 167 (1631); Woodward v. Rowe, 2 Keble, 105 (1666).

(j) See Goodwin v. Robarts, L. R. 10 Ex. 337.

(k) It may be objected that the above divisions slur over the great services to commercial law of Holt. In the Introduction to former editions of this treatise, it is said, "I have no hesitation in saying that Lord Holt alone accomplished more for English mercantile law than the whole body of the English judges prior to his elevation;" and in a note it is observed, "The present law with regard to bills of lading seems to have originated with Lord Holt": see Evans v. Martlett, 1 Ld. Raym. 271.

the introduction of the habit of separating in the charge to the jury the law from the facts, were solid improvements. "Before Lord Mansfield's time," says Buller, J., in Lickbarrow v. Mason (l), in a well-known passage in his judgment, "we find that in the courts of law all the evidence in mercantile law were thrown together; they were left generally to a jury, and they produced no established principle. More than anyone else Lord Mansfield helped to bring about in this a change." The language of the Courts was still uncertain; judges were not agreed as to whether they took the law from skilled merchants, or gave it to them. But, speaking broadly, mercantile law was proved as foreign law now is; it was a question of fact; merchants spoke to the existence of their customs as foreign lawyers speak to the existence of laws abroad. When so proved, a custom was part of the law of the realm. Lord Mansfield went in one respect back to old usage; he may be said to have re-established the connection between English law and the mercantile law of the continent. In Luke v. Lyde (m) Lord Mansfield, in deciding the question what freight was due for carriage of goods which were lost before the voyage was finished, cited the Pandects, the Consolato del Mare, the laws of Oleron, the laws of Wisby, Cleirac's Us et Coutumes, the Ordinances of Louis XIV., Roccus de Navibus, Molloy and Malynes. When Lord Mansfield said, "The maritime law is not the law of a particular country, but the general law of nations" (n), he repeated language familiar to early writers.

With the subsequent history of mercantile law it is unnecessary to deal. The decisions of the Courts have done much to develop mercantile law, especially in regard to agency, insurance, and sale. Much more has been effected by legislation: the law of joint stock companies, trade marks, merchant shipping, bankruptcy, is almost entirely of statutory origin. The Acts printed in the Appendix to this work approach nearer to a complete mercantile code than the so called Codes de Commerce of other countries.

COMPENDIUM OF MERCANTILE LAW.

BOOK THE FIRST.

OF MERCANTILE PERSONS.

TRADE may be carried on by Individuals, Partnerships, or Companies, and their respective Agents. As it will, therefore, be necessary to devote some space to each of the above classes of the mercantile community, this Book will be divided into four chapters, the first, treating of Sole Traders; the second, of Partnerships ordinarily so called; the third, of those peculiar and extensive partnerships denominated Companies; the fourth, of persons occupying the relation of Principal and Agent.

CHAPTER I.

OF SOLE TRADERS.

Sole traders.

THE word "trader" had once, in English law, a technical meaning: it was the description of a person subject to the lex mercatoria. When that ceased to be a distinct branch of law, binding only a certain class of persons, those who did any act regulated by that law were said to be traders quoad that act. Thus, it is laid down in books of authority that if a man draw a bill of exchange he is, for the purposes of the bill, a merchant (a). The words "trader" and "trading" were used

(a) Com. Dig. "Merchant" A. I. Bramwell, B., in Josselyn v. Parson, L. R. 7 Ex. at p. 129, defines a merchant as "one who buys and sells" an article or articles. The French Commercial Code thus defines traders: Sont commerçans ceux qui exercent des actes de commerce, et qui en font leur profession habituelle: l. I. t. 1. a. I. The definition in the German Commercial Code is (s. 4.)—Als Kaufmann in Sinne dieses Gesetzbuchs ist anzusehen wer ge- before the present Bankruptcy Act in a definite and peculiar sense (b); and in ascertaining the authority of partners to bind their firms by drawing, accepting or indorsing negotiable instruments, it is still necessary to distinguish between trading and non-trading partnerships (c).

Every agreement by which any one is restrained from carrying on a lawful profession, trade, or business, is (subject to the exceptions hereafter stated) to that extent void.

"Restraint of trade, according to a general principle of the Common Law, is unlawful" (d).

"Accordingly, a bond or other contract by which a person binds himself generally not to exercise his trade or business in this country is presumptively void" (e). All contracts in general restraint of trade would appear to be void. This opinion was adopted recently by a majority of the judges of the Court of Appeal (f), who declined to assent to the opinion expressed by Kekewich, J., that a contract in restraint of trade, unlimited as to space, may be valid, provided the limitation be reasonably required by the person stipulating for it (g). A contract in partial restraint of trade will be enforced if it is reasonable in its nature and extent, and founded on a lawful (not necessarily an adequate) consideration (h). The reasonableness of the contract is to be determined with reference to the nature of the business, and the protection required (i). Contracts in restraint of trade may be divisible as regards time or space; they may be valid only in part. Thus, in the case of a covenant not to carry on a business in London, or in any of certain specified towns, the Court, while refusing to give effect to the last part of the covenant, may enforce the contract in regard to London (k). It has been said that "all restraints of trade, though only partial, if nothing more appears, are presumed to be bad" (l). But this presumption does not appear to exist; in the case of a partial restraint of trade it is apparently a question for the Court whether it is in the circumstances reasonable (m).

D. 351, seem to show that covenants unlimited as to space may be held binding. None of these expressions, in view of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Davies v. Davies, 36 Ch. D. 359, are free from doubt.

Contracts by which employers agreed not to employ workmen, or by which the latter agreed not to work, according as a majority might determine, were, for similar reasons, declared invalid; whether such combinations were indictable offences was doubtful (n). By the Trades Union Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31), ss. 2, 3, contracts are not unlawful by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade (o). Many of the older authorities were obviously affected by the circumstance that a prolonged apprenticeship and other conditions were necessary preliminaries to the practising of most trades. Some of the reasons given for the rule of Common Law in Lord Macclesfield's judgment in Mitchel v. Reynolds have little weight at a time when entering into a contract in restriction of the practice of one trade may furnish a man with the capital necessary to start a new business.

of Appeal refused, at the instance of the society, to enforce against a member a stipulation in articles of association to the following effect: "No member shall employ any traveller who has left the service of another member, without the consent in writing of his late employer, until after the expiration of two years from his leaving the service." This was held to be a contract in restraint of trade, and not protected by the Trades Union Act or enforceable.

Certain classes of persons are incapacitated from engaging in commercial pursuits. An alien ranks either under the head of alien friend or that of alien enemy, i. e., the nation to which he belongs is either at peace or war with this kingdom. In the former case, he may trade in this country as freely as any British subject: indeed, his safety while doing so is the subject of a special clause in Magna Charta. In order to enable him to trade with more ease and advantage, he was permitted to hold a lease for years of a house, for "without habitation he cannot merchandise or trade" (q). And though there was an ancient statute (32 Hen. 8, c. 16) which avoided leases (r) of houses and shops granted to alien artificers and handicraftsmen, yet it was very strictly construed (s). Now (t) an alien may take, acquire, hold and dispose of real and personal property, except British ships, in all respects as a natural born subject. But an alien enemy, or a British subject adhering to the Queen's enemies, is incapable of trading here, except by the Queen's licence (u), which must, if granted, be very strictly pursued (v). On the conclusion of peace, however, he may recover on a contract executed before the war (x).

Infants are incapable of absolutely binding themselves by any contract which is not for necessaries. An infant cannot even state an account or give a cognovit (y). No action can be maintained against him upon any promise made after full age to pay a debt contracted during infancy, or upon any ratification after full age of a promise or contract made during infancy (z). Of course, therefore, he cannot support the character of a sole trader (a). Nor can he, if he has traded, in the absence of proof of express representation that he was of age, be made a bankrupt (b). An infant entering into a contract of partnership incurs no liability for the debts of the firm; but if he does not within a reasonable time after coming of age repudiate the contract, he will be held liable as a partner for acts done after that event (c). If he has obtained advantages under a contract, e. g., received goods, and cannot place the person contracting with him in the same position as before the contract, he cannot recover money which he has paid (d).

If a person be induced to take shares by a fraudulent prospectus, such a contract is voidable; but after the commencement of winding up the right to rescind is gone: Tennent v. Glasgow Bank, 4 App. Cas. 615. On the other hand, an infant who takes shares is not bound by the winding-up order. Even if he come of age after the winding up, his status

Married women are, at common law, incapable of binding themselves personally by contracts (e). By the custom of the City of London a married woman may be there a sole trader (f); and when a woman's husband is civilly (g), although not physically, dead, or she has been deserted by him and obtained an order, which is in force, for protection of her earnings and property (h), or she is living apart from him under a sentence of judicial separation (i), she may carry on trade as if she were a feme sole, for her own support, and in either of these cases may become a bankrupt (j). By the Married Women's Property Acts (33 & 34 Vict. c. 93; 37 & 38 Vict. c. 50; and 45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), the Common Law has been materially altered. The following are some of the chief provisions of the Act of 1882, which repeals the two previous Acts and consolidates the law:—

"Sect. I.—(1.) A married woman shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, be capable of acquiring, holding, and disposing by will or otherwise, of any real or personal property as her separate property, in the same manner as if she were a feme sole, without the intervention of any trustee.

(2.) A married woman shall be capable of entering into and rendering herself liable in respect of and to the extent of her separate property on any contract, and of suing and being sued, either in contract or in tort, or otherwise, in all respects as if she were a feme sole, and her husband need not be joined with her as plaintiff or defendant, or be made a party to any action or other legal proceeding brought by or taken against her; and any damages or costs recovered by her in any such action or proceeding shall be her separate property; and any damages or costs recovered against her in any such action or proceeding shall be payable out of her separate property, and not otherwise.

(e) A clear statement of a married woman's rights at common law will be found in Lord Selborne's judgment in Cahill v. Cahill, 8 App. Cas. 420, 425.

(3.) Every contract entered into by a married woman shall be deemed to be a contract entered into by her with respect to and to bind her separate property, unless the contrary be shown.

(4.) Every contract entered into by a married woman with respect to and to bind her separate property, shall bind not only the separate property which she is possessed of or entitled to at the date of the contract, but also all separate property which she may thereafter acquire.

(5.) Every married woman carrying on a trade separately from her husband shall, in respect of her separate property, be subject to the bankruptcy laws, in the same way as if she were a feme sole.

"Sect. II. Every woman who marries after the commencement of this Act shall be entitled to have and to hold as her separate property, and to dispose of in manner aforesaid, all real and personal property which shall belong to her at the time of marriage, or shall be acquired by or devolve upon her after marriage, including any wages, earnings, money, and property gained or acquired by her in any employment, trade, or occupation in which she is engaged, or which she carries on separately from her husband, or by the exercise of any literary, artistic or scientific skill."

Section 1 has the effect only of binding a married woman's separate estate. Consequently, if she has, at the time of a judgment against her, no separate estate, the judgment cannot be enforced under sect. 5 of the Debtors Act (k). Nor can she, by a contract entered into at a time when she has no separate estate, bind property which she may afterwards acquire (l). The expression "separate property," in section 1, includes only that which would, if the woman were unmarried, be her "property." It does not, therefore, include a general power of appointment by deed or will of which she is donee, but which she has not exercised; and a married woman who has become bankrupt cannot be compelled to exercise such power in favour of the trustee in bankruptcy (m).

Section 6 enacts that all shares which stand in the name of a married woman are to be deemed, unless or until the contrary is shown, her separate property (n). The effect of the Act appears to be that, as regards shares standing in the name of the married woman at the commencement of the Act, her husband is liable as a contributory under sect. 78 of the Companies Act, 1862, and that her separate estate is liable to contribute (o); as to shares placed on the register in her name after the commencement of the Act, her separate estate alone is liable.

Clergymen holding any cathedral preferment, benefice, curacy, or lectureship, or licensed, or allowed to perform the duties of any ecclesiastical office, are prohibited from carrying on, in person, any trade or dealing for gain or profit, or dealing in goods, wares or merchandise. Neither can this be done by any one for their use, unless in the case of a partnership of more than six, or where the interest has devolved upon them by will, descent, marriage, or bankruptcy, and in those cases they must not act as directors or managing partners. There is an exception in the case of schoolmasters and tutors supplying their pupils, or in disposing of books or other works through a publisher or bookseller (p).

There were formerly numerous disabilities imposed by statutes, which forbade the exercise of certain trades to all persons who had not previously served an apprenticeship thereto (q): and there were other disabilities, imposed by the customs and laws of corporate towns, which prohibited the exercise of particular trades by strangers within the territories of the respective corporations (r). The former class is, however, repealed by statute 54 Geo. 3, c. 96, and the latter is in great part repealed by sect. 247 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), which re-enacts sect. 14 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835.

Partnership—what.

PARTNERSHIP is the result of a contract, whereby two or more persons agree to combine property or labour, for the purpose of a common undertaking, and the acquisition of a common profit (a). There may be a partnership in one transaction as well as in a continuing business, and between persons out of trade as well as in trade; since, in either case, there may be a combination of property or labour, in order to carry on a common undertaking and for a common profit (b).

One partner may stipulate to be free from loss, and the stipu-

(a) The above definition is retained, though, perhaps, it is open to the objection that it includes cases of joint ownership: e.g., French v. Styring, 2 C. B. N. S. 357. In the Partnership Bill (1889), s. 6, partnership is defined as "the relation which subsists between persons who have agreed to carry on business and share profits some way in common"—a definition probably unexceptionable. Compare the Indian Contract Act, s. 239: remarks of Jessel, M. R., in Pooley v. Driver, L. R. 5 Ch. D. at p. 470; Mollwo v. Court of Wards, L. R. 4 P. lation will hold good as between himself and his companions (c), though it will not diminish his liability to strangers (d). So, too, one partner may contribute all the money, all the stock, or all the labour necessary for the purposes of the firm.

There is no partnership without a community of profits (e). The right to participate in profits is not conclusive—it is not by itself a presumption—of the existence of a partnership: it is strong evidence of such existence (f). That is a question to be determined by the whole agreement between the parties, their acts, and conduct. "What we have to consider, when we are considering questions as between the parties themselves," said Cotton, L. J., in Walker v. Hirsch (g),—a case in which a servant paid partly by a share of profits claimed to be a partner,—"and not as between strangers and one of the parties, or all of them, is really this: What rights had the contract entered into in fact given one of the parties against the other? . . . What we really have to consider is this, What, on the contract between the parties, are the rights which that contract has, inter se, given to one as against the other?" (h).

Partnership may approximate to joint ownership. A. and B. agree together to contribute each a sum of money, for the purchase of a lot of goods, which they intend afterwards to divide; in this case, after the purchase of the goods and before the division, they are joint owners thereof, not partners, unless, indeed, such was their intention (i). If, instead of dividing, they sell

The following passage from the judgment of Bacon, V.-C., in London Financial Association v. Kelk, ubi supra, illustrates the distinction:—"One of the charges pressed by the plaintiffs was that the directors, by entering into the agreement of August, 1865, had committed the association to a partnership with Mr. Rodocanachi and Messrs. Kelk & Lucas, and that them again, and divide the gain accruing upon the re-sale, they become, in the legal sense of that word, partners. Though the profit of partners must be joint, they may, if they think fit, arrange that it shall be unequally divided (l).

The working of a mine, colliery, or other real property of that description, is looked on to some extent as a trade; and where several persons, having a common interest in such property, work it in common, and sell the produce for their benefit, they become partners (m). Part owners of a ship are not necessarily partners; they are usually tenants in common; they have not they had, in this respect, violated and exceeded the terms of the memoraudum, and had exposed the assets of the association to the risks attendant upon a partnership. It does not appear to me that either in law or in fact any kind of partnership was created. Each of the three parties was entitled under the contract to an undivided share in the subject. Each paid for that share with individual separate money. The three had, no doubt, in a sense, a common interest in the subject; but no one of the essential elements of a partnership was found to exist in the case, for no one of them could interfere with either of the others in whatever disposition the others might make of their separate shares; nor could the death or bankruptcy or transfer or devolution of the shares of any one of the parties affect the rights of the others; neither of them could object to the introduction of any other person, or be liable in respect of any debt or engagement of the others." Pothier thus defines the difference (Traité du Contrat de Société, 600):—"(2) La principale différence entre la société et cette espèce de communauté, c'est que la société est un contrat, et que la communauté qui en résulte, est formée par la volonté et le consentement des parties. Au contraire, cette espèce de communauté n'est pas un contrat, et elle se forme sans le consentement et la volonte des parties . . . On peut encore apporter cette différence, que la communauté que forme la société est toujours formée par un seul et même titre, qui est contrat de société; au lieu que cette espèce de communauté sans société peut se former ou par un même titre, ou par différents titres."

authority as owners to bind each other; and they usually appoint a ship's husband, who alone has authority to bind them (n).

Many societies, such, for instance, as clubs, resemble in some respects partnerships (o). But they are not true partnerships; the object is not the acquisition of a common profit; changes in their members do not affect their existence.

A similar remark is applicable to persons who become members of a provisional committee for the purpose of promoting a railway or other enterprise, though the end which they propose to themselves may be individual profit. By simply consenting to become members of such a committee, and to the publication of their names, they do not authorise the managing committee or the officers to bind them by contracts, even for necessaries, to prosecute the project (p).

The right to participate in profits is not conclusive of the existence of a partnership (q). The inference may be rebutted by other facts; it may appear, for example, that the relationship is that of debtor and creditor, or master and servant (r). The remarks on this point of Sir Montague Smith, in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in Mollwo, March & Co. v. Court of Wards (s), have so often been repeated by other judges, that they may be here cited:

"It appears to be now established, that although a right to participate in the profits of trade is a strong test of partnership, and that there may be cases where from such perception alone it may, as a presumption not of law but of fact, be inferred, yet that whether that relation does or does not exist must depend on the real intention and contract of the parties. It is certainly difficult to understand the principle on which a man, who is neither a real nor ostensible partner, can be held liable to a creditor of the firm.

Partnership—what.

The reason given in Grace v. Smith (t), that by taking part of the profits he takes part of the fund which is the proper security of the creditors, is now admitted to be unsound and insufficient to support it; for of course the same consequences might follow in a far greater degree from the mortgage of the common property of the firm, which certainly would not of itself make the mortgagee a partner. Where a man holds himself out as a partner, or allows others to do it, the case is wholly different. He is then properly estopped from denying the character he has assumed, and upon the faith of which creditors may be presumed to have acted. A man so acting may be rightly held liable as a partner by estoppel. Again, wherever the agreement between parties creates a relation which is, in substance, a partnership, no mere words or declarations to the contrary will prevent, as regards third persons, the consequences following from the real contract. . . . If cases should occur where any persons, under the guise of such an arrangement, are really trading as principals, they must not hope by such devices to escape liability; for the law, in cases of this kind, will look at the body and substance of the arrangements, and fasten responsibility on the parties according to their true or real character" (u).

The older authorities laid down a number of tests of partnerships, which are now either of doubtful value or are merely illustrations of a wider rule. Thus to constitute a community of profits as would make a partnership, a partner, it was said, must not only share in profits, but must share in them as a principal (v). Undoubtedly he must not be a mere agent, factor, or servant, receiving, in lieu of wages, a sum proportioned to the profit gained by his employers (x), or a certain portion of a fund which includes the profits, but is not dependent on them for existence. Still when a servant, agent, or other person, either upon an advance to the person carrying on a trade, or as representing a deceased partner, or selling the goodwill of a business, stipulated for a share in the profits, and so entitled himself to an account of them, it was held that he became, as to third persons, a partner (y).

By the Act to amend the Law of Partnership (z), it is provided that the receipt, by a third person, of a portion of the profits of a trade from the person carrying it on, on the advance of money to him by way of interest under a written contract, or by a servant or agent as his remuneration, or being the widow or child of a deceased partner, by way of annuity, or by a person who has sold the goodwill of the business, as the consideration of such sale, shall not of itself constitute the recipient a partner, or render him responsible as such. The Act appears to have been drawn under a misconception. The previous authorities did not make participation in profits decisive of the existence of partnership. The cases cited below show that the Act applies only when the relation of debtor and creditor exists; that an unsigned contract for an advance, though admissible as evidence of the terms upon which the advance was made, is not "a contract in writing" within the meaning of the Act (a); and that it does not deprive a creditor of any security which he may have or which he seeks to retain. Thus it does not deprive a mortgagee of the right to foreclose; though sect. 5 expressly states that the lender (b) "shall not be entitled to recover any portion of his principal, or of the profits or interest payable in respect of such loan," it has been held that the statute does not apply to an action to enforce a security. Though the statement of claim, in one case decided since the Act, asked for a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to a first charge upon debenture stock about to be issued, &c., the action was held to be in substance an action for foreclosure.

the Legislature have dictated no particular course, and the law adopted no peculiar regulation, founded on the nature of the subject, we must be guided by those principles which govern contracts in general. Thus, each of the parties to it must be competent. Therefore the contract of partnership, if attempted to be concluded by an infant, will be voidable at his full age (c), and void, if by an alien enemy (d). So, if the undertaking be illegal, the contract, upon ordinary principles of law, is void, and that, whether it be to do a thing improper in itself, or rendered so by the positive prohibition of the Legislature (e).

So much as to the rights between the parties themselves. As regards the rights of third persons, "the question generally, almost always, is, whether a man is liable on a contract not entered into by himself, nor under any express authority given by him, but alleged by the plaintiff to have been entered into under an implied authority given by one of the parties to another to transact all matters of business relating to the partnership, and to bind his partners by any contract entered into with reference to it. It is a question really whether what the defendant in fact had done had made the person who actually entered into the contract his agent for the purpose of entering into that particular contract" (f). The law of England is, that he who lends his name and credit to a firm, or suffers his name to be used by it, and, as the phrase is, "holds himself out to the world" as a partner therein, is liable for its engagements, and that, whether he have any real interest in the firm or not. It would be highly prejudicial to commerce to allow a wealthy man, by the loan of his name, to give other persons a factitious credit in the world, and then refuse to satisfy creditors who had made their advances upon the faith of his apparent responsibility (f). Such a man is usually called a nominal partner, a quasi-partner, or a partner by estoppel. It has been said to make no difference in his liability, that the creditor of the firm who seeks to charge him was not aware of such holding out at the time that he made his advance (g). But this is incorrect; there is no duty to the creditor unless the "holding out" was with his knowledge (h). In order to fix a person with responsibility of this description, no particular mode of holding himself out to the world as a partner is required. If he do acts, no matter of what kind, sufficient to induce others to believe that he is a partner, he will be chargeable as such: ex. gr., if he accept bills drawn on the firm (i), or describe himself as having a joint interest in its property (k). But a man who describes himself as partner with another in a particular kind of transaction, ex. gr., in discounting bills, does not thereby hold himself out as his general partner in any other business which he may happen to profess (l); and if the acts relied on as constituting a holding out were done without the knowledge or default of the person thereby represented as a partner, or if it can be proved that the party seeking to charge him had notice of the real circumstances of the case, he will not be answerable (m). Partnership—what.

Section II.—How formed.

A partnership must be formed by the intervention of all the persons to be bound by it. One partner may, as we shall see, bind another for many purposes without his knowledge. But there must be consent of every individual member of the firm to authorize the introduction of a new one (n); nor can the partners expel one of their members, unless such a power is expressly provided (o). So necessary is this consent, that the executors of a deceased partner are not allowed to occupy his place (p), unless there be a stipulation in the contract of partnership that they shall do so, in which case modus et conventio vincunt legem. But if there be in the articles of partnership an express provision, or in the nature and constitution of the partnership anything which renders it impossible that the members could have expected or intended the consent of the whole body to be applied for upon the occasion of each change, such consent would be unnecessary (q). Even where there is no such consent, expressly or impliedly given, the transfer will not be inoperative. A partner may assign or mortgage his share (r); and an action may be maintained on an agreement for the sale of it. The sale may be to a co-partner. How formed.

establish such a principle. They relate to dealings by a partner, during the continuance of the partnership, with either present or future partnership assets or liabilities. A man obtaining his locus standi, and his opportunity for making such arrangements, by the position he occupies as a partner, is bound by his obligations to his co-partners in such dealings not to separate his interest from theirs, but if he acquires any benefit to communicate it to them. I should be sorry to see the day when the principle of such cases as Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick (s) could be disturbed or called in question.... If that or any other bargain, made by a partner with another partner, being concealed, were used for unfair or illegitimate purposes in the subsequent part of the partnership concern, and if when the facts became known it should appear that wrong had been done, and damage sustained by means of any such secret arrangement between two partners, redress suitable to the nature of the injury and the circumstances of the case, might probably be found. But that would depend, not on the agreement by one partner to give a beneficial interest in his share to another, but upon the use assumed to have been made of that agreement in an illegitimate way to the prejudice of a third partner, and upon proof of actual damage having occurred" (t).

Respecting the formation of the contract of partnership, it need only further be observed, that it is not one of those which the law requires to be in writing, and it may therefore either be concluded or varied by mere words, or inferred from the acts of the parties (u).

The Companies Act, 1862, has imposed a restriction, unknown at common law, upon the number of partners. A partnership may consist of any number not exceeding ten in the case of a banking partnership, and in the case of any other partnership twenty (x). A partnership in excess of these limits must be registered under the Companies Act, 1862, or formed in accordance with an Act of Parliament, charter, or letters patent, or be within the Stannaries Acts. Any partnership carrying on business without complying with this proviso is illegal; and a person dealing with them with notice of the illegality cannot enforce his claim (y). Partnership—how formed.

The name of the firm need not be that of any member of it; partners are free to carry on business under any designation which they think fit to adopt. The designation, however, must not be calculated to deceive the public (z). "It is a fraud," said Gifford, L. J., in Lee v. Haley (a), "on a person who has established a trade, and carries it on under a given name, that some other person should assume the same name, or the same name with a slight alteration in such a way as to induce persons to deal with him in the belief that they are dealing with the person who has given a reputation to the name." Hence the members of a partnership may restrain a joint stock company from being registered under a name so much alike as to mislead people into believing that they were dealing with the former (b). The name of a firm may be registered as a trade mark for particular goods or classes of goods (c).

Section III.—How dissolved.

Three cases have to be considered; (1) when the contract of partnership provides for the dissolution; (2) when the dissolution of the partnership takes place by order of the Court; (3) when the dissolution takes place by operation of law without the aid of the Court. How dissolved.

It often happens that at the time of the formation of a contract of partnership the parties expressly agree that it shall endure but for a stated period. There may also happen cases in which, though there be no express provision, an implied contract as to its duration may arise: for instance, partners may purchase leasehold interests of such a description as to raise a fair presumption that they intended to continue the partnership as long as those leases should endure (c), though such a circumstance is by no means conclusive. If a limit to the term of partnership be thus prefixed, the contract will, of course, dissolve on its arrival. It may likewise be dissolved by mutual consent.

The Chancery Division (d) has power to put an end to it by its decrees; a power which it will exercise if the partnership have been brought about by misrepresentation (e); or in case the partnership undertaking turn out impracticable (f), or hopelessly embarrassed (g), or one of the partners become an incurable lunatic (h), or be guilty of gross misconduct, such as refusing to account for his receipts, or to submit his dealings to the examination of his companions (i), or because he has rendered himself liable to a criminal prosecution (j). The Court may order a return of premium, or do otherwise what is equitable between the parties (k). But to induce the Court to interfere in this manner there must be some serious reason given; the existence of comparatively unimportant disputes and squabbles will not be sufficient (l).

that a shareholder who has been induced to become such by fraud or misrepresentation cannot obtain a rescission of the contract when the company is insolvent (m). This is not so in the case of an ordinary partnership. A partner who has been deceived by fraudulent representation may have the contract set aside, even if the partnership is insolvent, and is entitled to a lien on the surplus of the partnership assets after satisfying liabilities (n); whether he may require the partners who have deceived him to indemnify him against the outstanding debts of the firm is uncertain (o).

If no limit to the partnership was originally fixed, it is called a partnership at will, and may be dissolved at the individual pleasure of either party at even a moment's notice (p); though, of course, subsisting engagements must be provided for (q). The notice must be explicit, and given to all the partners (r).

In all cases a partnership is dissolved, without application to the Court, by the bankruptcy of any one of the partners followed by adjudication (s), by his outlawry, or attainder of treason or

(1) When a partner becomes of unsound mind;

(2) When a partner, other than the partner suing, has been adjudicated an insolvent under any law relating to insolvent debtors;

(3) When a partner, other than the partner suing, has done an act by which the whole interest of such partner is legally transferred to a third person;

(4) When any partner becomes incapable of performing his part of the partnership contract;

(5) When a partner, other than the partner suing, is guilty of gross misconduct in the affairs of the partnership or towards his partners;

(6) When the business of the partnership can only be carried on at a loss.

felony; for the first of these disqualifies him for the duties of a partner, and the others strip him of all civil capacity (r). It has been thought that a sale of the common stock under a separate execution against one of the partners would amount to a dissolution of the partnership (s). In effect this happens when a stranger is the purchaser of the interest. "What the sheriff has got to sell," said Lindley, L. J., in Helmore v. Smith (t), "is not the share and interest of the execution debtor in the partnership, but the share and interest of the execution debtor in such of the chattels of the partnership as are seizable under a fi. fa. The unfortunate purchaser from the sheriff has to find out what he has really had assigned to him, and that he can only do by a partnership account; there is no other method of proceeding. That does involve practically a dissolution of the whole concern."

The death of one of the partners operates, of course, as a dissolution, since we have seen that his executors cannot represent him (u). Formerly this was also the effect of the marriage of a female partner (x); but since the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, this appears to be no longer the case.

Whenever any of the above circumstances happen, the entire firm, though it consists of ever so many, is dissolved, unless the contrary have been in express terms provided for (y); though the remaining partners may, of course, come to a new agreement to carry on the business upon the old terms. And herein our law adopts the maxim of the civilians: cum aliquis renunciaverit societati solvitur societas; the reason of which is thus expressed by M. Pothier, "Traité du Contrat de Société," cap. 8, § 3: "La raison est que les qualités personnelles de chacun des associés entrent en considération dans le contrat de société"—a reason upon which the law of England sometimes acts in pronouncing other contracts dissolved on the secession of a party whose personal qualifications may have been the chief inducement to enter into them (z). When the term of partnership agreed upon has expired, and it is continued, the partnership will be taken to be continued on the old terms, so far as they are not inconsistent with the implied terms of a partnership at will (a). Partnership—how dissolved.

A partner may, with the consent of the other partners, retire from the firm without its being dissolved; he may, for instance, sell his interest to them (b). Such a transaction, converting joint into separate estate, will bind the trustee in bankruptcy if the contract be made bonâ fide and carried into effect before the commission of an act of bankruptcy. If merely executory, it will not bind the trustee (c).

The above are the modes in which a partnership may be determined as between the partners themselves. Those who desire to end it as to strangers, should give notice to the world of its dissolution, otherwise they hold themselves out as being still in conjunction with their late partners, and will continue to be bound by their engagements (d). The mode of giving this notice will be hereafter described, when we come to speak of the time at which the liability of partners to third persons determines.

Rights and liabilities of partners among themselves.

Partners are jointly, and, in the absence of evidence (y) to the contrary, are taken to be equally (z), interested in the partnership stock and effects, subject to the application of a maxim which will hereafter be discussed, viz., "Jus accrescendi inter mercatores locum non habet" (a). But equity, which exercises a peculiar jurisdiction over the accounts of partners, has always looked on the right of each in the joint stock as subject to the state of those accounts; so that, as between himself and his companions, his valuable interest may amount to little or nothing. Nay, he may be indebted to the concern of which he is a member. A partnership is held in equity so far distinct from the individuals composing it, that each of them may buy or borrow from the firm, and the firm from him vice versâ (b). Although each partner, acting as such, can, as we shall hereafter see, bind the joint stock by dealing with strangers in the name of the firm, yet he cannot do so by any act on his own individual account, to a larger extent than his own interest. Thus, though the goods may be taken, and his share therein sold for his own private debt, yet the purchaser from the sheriff buys only that to which the defendant is (as between himself and his companions) justly entitled (c); and the rule is the same if he become individually a bankrupt (d).

In the absence of agreement, a partner's right seems like that of other joint-owners: if there be two, an undivided moiety; if three, a third; and so on: Farrar v. Beswick, 1 M. & Rob. 527; Mayhew v. Herrick, 7 C. (a) Vide Book II. As to the relationship between surviving partners and the representatives of a deceased partner, see Knox v. Gye, L. R. 5 H. L. 656.

(b) But pending the partnership, and before any settlement of accounts, the advances are not treated as debts; they are only items in the account between the partners. See Lord Cottenham, C., Richardson v. Bank of England, 4 My. & Cr. at p. 172.

(d) West v. Skip, 1 Ves. sen. 242;

Rights and liabilities of partners among themselves.

To ascertain each partner's share in the joint stock, it is primarily important to know what property is comprehended within that denomination. Now it by no means follows that, because property has been used or risked for the service of the firm, it is therefore partnership property. It may be the sole property of any one of the partners. Thus, if A., being the owner of a parcel of goods, propose to B. that they should exert themselves jointly in selling them, and divide the profit, B., although a partner in the profits, is not so in the goods, nor are they any part of the joint stock, but the sole property of A., risked by him for the service of the partnership (e). But partnerships may, and do, exist in which all the capital is contributed by one, and nothing but his labour by the other, who, nevertheless, is entitled to consider the capital as joint stock, and claim an equal share of it or its produce (f). The law in all these cases moulds itself to the intention of the parties when that can be ascertained, and is conformable in this respect to the doctrine laid down by continental jurists (g).

Land which has become partnership property is treated as between the partners and their representatives as personal property, unless the contrary is agreed upon, or an intention to the contrary may be collected from the contract of the parties. Thus, as personalty, it is subject to probate duty (h).

In the conduct of partners towards each other, the most scrupulous fidelity must be observed, and its observance is enforced by Courts. Thus, one is not allowed to obtain any private advantage at the expense of the rest; if he do, he will be prevented from enjoying it, or compelled to hold it as a trustee for their benefit (i). "It is clear," said Sir William Grant, M. R., "that one partner cannot treat privately, and behind the backs of his co-partners, for a lease of the premises, where the joint trade is carried on, for his own individual benefit; if he does so treat, and obtains a lease in his own name, it is a trust for the partnership" (k). In like manner, if he carries on a business which competes with that of which he is a partner, or if he sells goods to his firm without informing his fellow partners that he is the vendor, or obtains advantages from the employment of partnership property, he will be bound to account for the profits (l). A partner must not place himself in a situation likely to give him an interest, or even a bias, against the discharge of his duty (m); all which results from that broad principle of equity, that, from every person standing in a situation of trust and confidence with respect to another, a conduct marked with the most scrupulous good faith shall be required. It is almost superfluous to observe, that, in the case of partnership, good faith dictates not merely abstinence from all deceit and injury, but zealous co-operation in the objects of the concern, honourable exactness in keeping accounts, and readiness to submit them to inspection. Surely, considering that each partner is the accredited agent of the rest, and has power to bind them to all contracts within the scope of the joint trade, no one can blame the strictness with which this good faith is required by Courts, which will even declare the partnership dissolved, in case of any very flagrant breach thereof (n). This is, however, done with great reluctance; and the contract of partnership has been, not unaptly, compared by an eminent judge to that of marriage; since the parties to each take one another for better and for worse, and must not call at every turn upon the law to rectify the consequence of their own want of foresight.

Rights and liabilities of partners among themselves.

While subject to the duties of agents, partners possess rights as such, and they are entitled to be indemnified in respect of expenses incurred or contracts entered into in respect of partnership business (o).

It has been already observed that a partnership is often contracted in writing; such an agreement usually goes by the name of Articles of Partnership. Where these exist, they must, of course, as far as they go, be acted on, for modus et conventio vincunt legem. Their terms, however, are explained, and their deficiencies supplied, by reference to the above principles, which they themselves, indeed, in many parts, do little other than express (p). They generally declare the objects of the partnership; the time at which it is to commence, which, if no other be specified, is from the date of the articles (q); that at which it is to end; the amount of capital, and the proportions in which it is to be advanced by, and in which the profits of the trade are to be distributed among, the partners, who stipulate therein for the due performance of their respective duties. It is sometimes also provided that differences among them shall be ended by the vote of the majority, and in the absence of any agreement to the contrary it will be assumed that, as to matters incidental to the proper business of the partnership, the opinion of the majority must prevail (r). Almost always it is provided that an account shall be taken annually of the debts and effects of the partnership, and a particular mode of winding up affairs pursued upon its dissolution, in general, either by turning all the effects into money, and dividing them, which is the course pursued (r) by Courts if there be no stipulation on the subject, or by the transfer of one partner's share to the other at a valuation. Sometimes, also, it is agreed, that the executor or other person appointed in the will of a partner shall succeed him. Where there is such a clause, its general effect appears to be to give the executor, or appointee, his option whether he will remain a member of the firm, or have its affairs wound up, and his share ascertained and paid to him (s). And he will be entitled to a reasonable time, and an inspection of the partnership accounts to assist him in his election (t). Yet upon principle it seems, and probably would be decided that, if the testator intended him to have no option, he must either conform and carry on the trade, or relinquish his claim to any benefit under the will appointing him (u); and it behoves him to consider very warily, for if he once become a member of the firm, though but in trust for others, he will be liable, like any other partner, for its engagements, both in person and property, and may even become bankrupt (x). It has been usual to stipulate that disputes between partners shall be referred to arbitration; and the Court or a Judge has a discretionary power to compel a reference in such a case (y).

In construing these instruments, the Courts look mainly to the intention of the parties as evidenced by their conduct, and if they find that some of the provisions have been purposely and uniformly disregarded by all the partners or with their consent, the Courts will even consider them totally dispensed with.

"There would," said Lord Eldon, in the case of Jackson v. Sedgwick (z), "be no difficulty in applying the articles to the particular business with reference to which they were framed. But if the parties engage in business in which their application would work injustice, then, I say, that these articles, though they contain a general reference to other business, are not such as would have been prepared with relation to that specific business, and that engaging in that business affords a reason for not performing the stipulations."

By section 34 of the Judicature Act, 1873, is assigned to the Chancery Division, among other matters, "the dissolution of partnerships or the taking of partnerships or other accounts." But, subject to this, proceedings relative to partnerships may be taken in either the Chancery or Queen's Bench Division. Actions cannot now be defeated by misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties; pleas in abatement are abolished; and it is now competent for a partner to sue or be sued by a firm, or for two firms having a common partner to sue each other (a).

If there be so flagrant a violation of any covenant contained in articles of partnership as to call for a dissolution of the entire contract, the Court will enforce that dissolution by its order; but where there is a covenant, and therefore another adequate remedy, it has a strong disinclination to interfere in any case of less importance (b); unless, perhaps, under circumstances of peculiar aggravation and hardship (c); especially if the remedy were inadequate to compensate the party injured.

The Court will also examine and adjust the accounts of partners between themselves, but whether a partner can pray for an account without a dissolution of the partnership has been questioned. Lord Eldon seems to have thought, and Sir L. Shadwell decided, that he could not (d); but Sir John Leach sustained the contrary opinion (e), which, from Lord Cottenham's judgment in Wallworth v. Holt (f), seems to be the better one, at all events where the account is not sought with the mere object of a division of profits. Therefore, when one partner is violating the partnership contract for the fraudulent purpose of compelling a dissolution, and has excluded his co-partner from the books, and refused to give any account, the Court will entertain an action which has for its object the enabling of the latter to have the benefit of the articles without a dissolution, and will grant him relief, and some account as incidental to it (g). And if, in a continuing partnership, a few have an interest in a particular subject-matter adverse to the rest, and claim the benefit of that interest for themselves, an action may be maintained against those few by one or more of the other parties on behalf of himself and all the rest, praying an account respecting it, without praying even a general account (h).

On decreeing a dissolution and taking the account, the Court has power to order a sale of the partnership effects and goodwill and a division of the produce (i), in the proportion to which it considers each partner entitled. It may decide as to the use of the old name. It may also order any premium, or part of it, to be repaid. In fixing the proportion (k) to be repaid, the Court takes into consideration, not merely the balance upon all transactions completed at the period of the dissolution, but also such as were at that time pending, and from which profit or loss has since resulted (l). Nay, if one partner die, or become

In certain cases it will also give him a proportion of a premium paid by him on entering the firm: Astle v. Wright, 23 Beav. 77; Atwood v. Maude, L. R. 3 Ch. 369; Bluck v. Capstick, 12 Ch. D. 863; Wilson v. Johnstone, L. R. 16 Eq. 606; Lyon v. Tweddell, 17 Ch. D. 529. The authorities are not agreed as to whether the rule applies to premature dissolution by the parties as well as to premature dissolution by the Court. The matter appears to be bankrupt, which, we have seen, causes the immediate dissolution of the concern, and the remaining partners continue to trade with the joint stock, the representatives of their late partner will be entitled to a portion of the profits, since his property was made use of in order to acquire them, and was thus exposed to the risks of bankruptcy (m). But the executors incur no liability merely from the circumstance that business is carried on by the surviving partners in the old name of the firm (n). They will be personally liable if they carry on the business, accept bills, &c., in their own names or in the name of their testator's firm (o). The claim of representatives of a deceased partner against a surviving partner is of the nature of a simple contract debt. Hence, in Knox v. Gye (p), it was decided by the House of Lords that a suit for an account by the representatives of a deceased partner against a surviving partner was barred by the lapse of six years from the partner's death.

In cases of misconduct the Court will sometimes interfere, by restraining by injunction the offender from a repetition of his ill-behaviour. In some cases, too, where one partner seeks to exclude another from that share of the concern to which he is entitled, and the partnership concern is in danger (q), the Court will appoint a receiver of the partnership stock (r), but with reluctance, since such a step can scarcely be taken without injury to the trade (s).

Rights and liabilities of partners among themselves.

Formerly criminal proceedings could not be taken by his partners against a member of the firm who misappropriated its effects; but now, if he steals or embezzles them, he may be punished as if he had not been a partner (t).

Section V.—Rights of Third Persons against Partners.

Rights of third persons against partners.

Next, as to the rights of third persons against the partnership. It is a general rule, that each partner is the accredited agent of the rest, and has authority as such to bind them, either by contracts respecting the goods or usual business of the firm, or by negotiable instruments circulated in its behalf, to any person dealing bonâ fide (u).

Although it may have been agreed among themselves that a partner shall have no such authority (x), they will be bound, unless the party dealing with him have notice of the arrangement (y). And in order to engage the firm, it is not necessary that all its members should be specified; for a partnership comprising several, as A., and B., and C., may carry on trade in the name of one, as A., or in the name of "A. and C.," or even in a fictitious name, or that of a mere stranger; and when any of these methods is adopted, the pledge of the partnership's name binds the whole firm (z). Nay, to such an extent is this

But if a dormant partner has, in fact, no authority, and he is not known to be a partner, it seems that he cannot bind the other partners. "If, indeed, a mere dormant partner were known to be a partner, and the limitation of his authority were not known, he might be able to draw bills and give orders for goods, which would bind his co-partners; but in the ordinary case this could not be so, and he would not in the slightest degree be in the position of an agent for them": Cleasby, B., in Holme v. Hammond, L. rule carried, that where two firms have a common partner and a common name, each one can bind the other to the payment of negotiable securities, drawn, indorsed, or accepted in that common name (a). For the same reason, if two firms have a common partner notice to the one is deemed notice to the other (b).

A partner may bind the rest by simple contracts; he cannot, it is said, bind his co-partners by deed unless he have express authority by deed for that purpose, not even though the contract of partnership were under seal, if it do not contain a specific power to that effect (c); nor, it has been said, though the others afterwards acknowledge his authority (d); and if he execute such instruments, he will himself be bound, though they will not (e). These observations, however, do not apply to cases where the deed is in the nature of a grant. It would seem that one partner can effectually release by deed in the name of the firm a debt or claim which they have; and this distinction appears conformable to general principles of law (f), since it is clearly (d) Sleiglitz v. Eggington, Holt, N. P. C. 141. Gibbs, C. J., gives no reason for his dictum; and it appears to be in conflict with Tupper v. Foulkes, 9 C. B. N. S. 797.

(e) Elliott v. Davies, 2 B. & P. 338. The reasons given for the above rule by Kenyon, C. J., in Harrison v. Jackson, 7 T. R. at p. 210, are that such a power was unknown to the law merchant, and that it would be productive of inconvenience. "It would extend to the case of mortgages, and would enable a partner to give to a favourite creditor a real lien on the estates of other partners." But such consequences would not result if the partner had not authority, express or implied; and if he had, the inconvenience is not obvious. In general, the ordinary course of business does not require partners to execute deeds. But if it were the business of a partnership to perform acts necessarily and usually requiring the execution of deeds, it is conceived that it would be within the scope of authority of a partner to execute instruments under seal required for the purpose of the partnership. See 2 Moore, Ind. App. 487, where a mortgage executed by some partners was held binding on the others; and article in American Law Review, March 1888, p. 253.

settled that, "if a party by his own act be barred from recovery in an action, he cannot, by joining other persons as plaintiffs, undo his own act and acquire a right to recover" (g). It must be observed, also, that though one partner cannot, unless authorised by deed, bind the remaining members of the firm by deed, so as to render them liable in covenant or as obligors, yet there may be cases in which the deed may bind their interest as a writing, in the same manner as the deed of an agent, not himself authorised by deed, has been held to bind his principal as an instrument in writing (h).

Moreover, the contract must be respecting the partnership business.

"In partnerships, both parties are authorised to treat for each other in everything that concerns or properly belongs to the joint trade, and will bind each other in transactions with every one who is not distinctly informed of any particular circumstances which may vary the case. On the other hand, if the transaction has no apparent relation to the partnership, then the presumption is the other way, and the partnership will not be bound by the acts of one of the partners without special circumstances" (i).

Such is the general rule, but it is not easy to draw the exact line, and say what matters are and what are not sufficiently akin to the partnership business. "It has," said Abbott, C. J., "undoubtedly been held, that in a matter wholly unconnected with the partnership, one partner cannot bind the other. But the true construction of the rule is this, that the act and assurance of one partner, made with reference to business transacted by the firm, will bind all the partners" (k); and in that case, a navy

(k) Sandilands v. Marsh, 2 B. & Ald. 673. That case, however, proceeded on the ground of a recognition and adoption. The Court thought that the defendant must have known or ought to have known the transaction from the partnership books. agent, whose business is not to deal in annuities, was held to bind his firm, by guaranteeing the payment of an annuity which he had purchased for a customer. On the other hand, one partner cannot bind another by submission to arbitration, without some authority beyond that which flows from the general relation of partnership, or unless the other partner assents in some way to the arbitration proceedings (l). Nor would the partnership be liable in respect of a banking account opened by one of the partners in his own name.

Sometimes it is said that in order to be authorised an act must not merely relate to the business of the partnership; it must be necessary or apparently necessary in ordinary circumstances. "The act of one partner to bind the firm," it is said, in Lindley on Partnership, with reference to Hawtayne v. Bourne (m), "must be necessary for the carrying on of its business; if all that can be said of it was that it was convenient, or that it facilitated the transaction of the business of the firm, that is not sufficient in the absence of evidence of sanction by the other partners. Nor, it seems, will necessity itself be sufficient if it be an extraordinary necessity. What is necessary for carrying on the business of the firm under ordinary circumstances, and in the usual way is the test" (n).

Co-partners cannot be bound by any contract made with their partner as an individual and on his own account, and not as agent of the firm, though he may afterwards impart to them the benefit derived from it (o). Thus a several note or acceptance by, or a several loan to, one of a partnership will never charge the rest, though their companion may have applied to the use of the firm the money which he obtained by the discount or advance (p). A good example of this is to be found in the contract under which books are frequently published, known to the trade by the name of the half-profits' contract, by which the author agrees to furnish the manuscript, and the publisher to print and publish it at his own risk and expense, and to account to the author for one-half of the net profits. In such a case, the author would not, unless he had held himself out as being so, be liable in respect of the printing and materials furnished to the bookseller (q). But it would be different, if the contracting partner were really empowered to treat, and did treat, on account of the firm (r), while he described himself as treating in his individual capacity; in such a case, although the partnership could not be sued on any security of a several nature given by him, still if the transaction had been such as a loan of money or a purchase of goods, the creditor would have a right to charge it, on subsequently discovering the transaction to have been on its account (s). And further, it is apprehended that the very nature and consideration of the debt may be such as to raise a presumption, in the absence of direct evidence, that it was incurred under the authority of the firm. Thus, if a member purchase goods, such as the firm deals in, and apply them when so purchased to its use, a strong presumption seems to arise that he was dealing in its behalf; though, had he borrowed money and contributed that to the firm, such a prenatim and D., it was held, that, even assuming them to have authority to bind the firm, it was a question of fact for the jury whether they intended to exercise it till the signature of C. had been added. This point seems susceptible of much controversy.

sumption might not have arisen. For when the firm desires a partner to procure goods, which they cannot but know he must obtain by purchase, the inference is, that they authorize him to purchase, and so contract through him with the vendor (t). But when they call on him for a contribution of money, the inference is, that they intend to receive it from himself, not to empower him to borrow for them from a third person; and therefore in such a case, where A. had lent money to B., who had advanced it to the firm of which he was a member, Lord Hardwicke said, "Here are plainly two contracts, one between A. and B., the other between B. and his partner" (u).

There is, of course, no doubt that a third party may contract with the whole firm, and take the several bill, note, bond, or other obligation of a co-partner, as his collateral security (v).

Provided the contract have a sufficient relation to the business of the firm, and the contractor have in other respects acted bonâ fide, it matters not much what may be its description, or how grievous the contracting partner's fraud and misconduct (x). "Each partner," said James, L. J., in Baird's case (y), "is the unlimited agent of every other in every matter connected with the partnership business, or which he represents as partnership business, and not being in its nature beyond the scope of the partnership." Thus the firm are liable, whether it be a loan for his expenses while engaged in the partnership business (z), or for a purchase of goods such as might be used therein, but which he instantly converts to his own benefit (a). So they are bound by his sale (b) or pledge (c) of the joint property or payment to him (d). So, though a partner has no right to guarantee a separate transaction in the name of the rest, he may give a guaranty for his partner in a matter relating to the partnership (e); and, if they afterwards adopt and recognise his act, they will be bound, whether the guaranty related to the business of the firm or not (f). So, too, acts done with the knowledge of the other partners, though outside the scope of the business, will bind them (g), e.g., if a member of a firm of solicitors, with the knowledge of the rest of his partners, receive the money of a client to invest, and misappropriates it, the firm will be liable.

Again, if the business in ordinary course requires the use of negotiable instruments, one partner can bind the firm by circulating negotiable instruments on its behalf. This is quite clear (h), and may be done, as we have above seen, by negotiating them in the name, whatever that may be, in which the partnership trade is usually carried on. The rule is thus laid down, by Cockburn, C. J., in Nicholson v. Ricketts (i), "In ordinary cases of commercial partnership there is no need of express authority, the law implying an authority from the fact that the drawing and accepting of bills is part of the ordinary course of such a partnership. So, again, in partnerships not strictly commercial, if it is obvious from the nature of the partnership, or from the particular purposes to which the bills are to be applied, that the drawing of bills is essential, there also the law implies an authority to each partner to draw them." These are, however, only illustrations of the general rule above stated. The practice as to borrowing, or using in lieu of money negotiable instruments, has changed, and is changing; and negotiable instruments are now used in businesses in which they were once unknown. The question is, what is usual and necessary in each business (h). We may further remark that, if a bill be drawn upon the partnership in their usual style and firm, and accepted by one of the partners in his own name, it will bind them all; for he must be understood, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to accept the bill according to the terms in which it is drawn (i). It has, however, been decided, that a partner cannot bind the rest by drawing a bill in any name except that of the firm (j), or by issuing acceptances in blank (k). A firm may use one distinct name for certain purposes, and another—that for instance of the managing partner—for the purpose of indorsing negotiable instruments (l). When a trade is carried on in the name of one partner, a question will arise, whether, in negotiating a bill or note, he meant to pledge the firm or himself only. The general rule on the subject is thus stated by Thesiger, L. J., in Yorkshire Banking Co. v. Beatson (m), where the authorities are reviewed: "Where a name is common to a firm and to an individual member of such firm, and the individual member carries on no business separate from that of the firm, there is a presumption that a bill of exchange drawn, accepted, or indorsed in the common name, is a bill drawn, accepted, or indorsed for the partnership, and for which the partnership is liable, and it lies upon the defendants in an action against the partners upon such bill to get rid of the primâ facie case made against them" (m).

Further, to bind partners, these negotiable instruments must have been circulated on behalf of the firm. Now, it is clear that, when the purposes of the firm do not require that its members should pass negotiable instruments, it is not very likely that such should be circulated on its behalf: in such cases, therefore, the implied authority of a partner fails, and the firm will not be bound by his negotiation (n). Hence a solicitor cannot bind his partner by a note, though given for the debt of the firm (o); and it has been decided, that partners in a farming or mining concern have no such authority (p). From the observations of the Judges in the case last cited, it may be collected: First, that partners in a trade, strictly mercantile (q), have an authority implied by law to bind each other by bills or notes. Secondly, that partners in some particular businesses, such as farming and mining, have, primâ facie, no such authority. Thirdly, that this presumption against their authority may be rebutted, by showing, 1st, that the constitution and particular purposes of the firm are such as to render it, in their individual cases, necessary; or, 2ndly, that, though not necessary, it is, in other similar cases, usual; "for if it were necessary or usual, the law would imply it" (r).

Lastly, it is an essential portion of the rule, that the person to whom the firm is to be bound should have dealt bonâ fide. If he who seeks to charge the firm was himself privy to a fraud; if he knew, or even if there were circumstances sufficient to induce a man of moderate discernment to believe, that the partner, with whom he contracted, had no authority to bind the rest, innocent members will not be allowed to suffer by his weakness or stupidity. "There is no doubt," said Lord Mansfield, "but that the act of every single partner in a transaction relating to the partnership binds all the others. But there is no general rule which may not be infected by covin, or such gross negligence as may amount or be equivalent to covin; for covin is defined to be a contrivance between two to defraud or cheat a third" (s). With respect to negotiable instruments given in the name of the firm, the rule is, that they cannot be enforced by any party who was guilty of fraud in receiving them (t), or who took them, knowing that they had been so fraudulently received, or even without knowing it, unless he gave a valuable consideration for them (u); but that they may be enforced by any one who obtained them for value, and without fraud (x), or gave a valuable consideration for them without knowing that they had been frauduently obtained (y).

The unexplained fact that a partnership security has been received from one of the partners in discharge of a separate claim against himself, is a badge of fraud, or of such palpable negligence as amounts to fraud (z), which it is incumbent on the party who so took the security to remove, by showing either that the partner from whom he received it acted under the authority of the rest, or at least that he himself had reason to believe so (a). Lord Ellenborough appears to have thought that, even in such a case, the onus of showing want of authority in the single partner would lie upon the firm, if it were, from the nature of the transaction, possible for them to procure direct testimony to that effect (b). But this seems to be erroneous. It is clear that unless the security was given or transferred for a separate demand no such presumption will arise (c); for, if it be in the ordinary course of commercial transactions, as upon discount, without any knowledge on the part of the transferee that it was a separate transaction, the firm will be bound, though the transferring partner may have converted the whole produce of the security to his own use (d). The transfer of a partnership security may be fraudulent in part, yet good for the residue (e). To hold the contrary would tend to shake all paper credit.

Though a transaction may be primâ facie fraudulent against the firm, yet it will bind them if they subsequently approve of it, for subsequent approbation raises an inference of previous positive authority (f). To constitute notification of an act done in excess of authority, there must be evidence of knowledge.

Besides the cases mentioned in the rule above laid down, the firm may in various other ways be bound by the conduct of a partner. Thus, his admission, his acknowledgment, or representation, is evidence against them (g) if the representations relate to the business of the firm (h). Before the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), an admission by one partner of a debt did not take it out of the Statute of Limitations (i). But it would seem that the effect of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 14) (j) is to make an acknowledgment signed by one partner equivalent to an acknowledgment signed by all the partners, and to make a part payment by one partner equivalent to a part payment by all (k). Notice by (l), or to (m), one partner is equivalent to notice by, or to, all. Moreover, as he is the accredited agent of the rest, it follows, upon grounds which we will examine more deliberately in Chapter IV., that they are liable for breaches of contract (n), and negligent wrongs (o) committed in such capacity. Nay, they have been held responsible for frauds (p) and breaches of the revenue laws committed by him in his management of the partnership business (q); and may even, in certain cases, be made criminally answerable for him (r). their servants or agents acting within the scope of their authority (s).

The liability of each partner to third persons in respect of the engagements of the others, commences with the commencement of his partnership, and is not postponed by postponing the execution of the deed, provided that the partnership have, in fact, commenced (t). He is not liable for contracts previously made (u). If, indeed, after his accession to the partnership he receive benefit from them and recognise their existence, he may become responsible by virtue of a new contract to the same effect as the old one, which his conduct will be evidence of his having entered into along with his partners (v). So, with the creditor's assent (x), the liability of the new firm may be substituted for that of the old; and, as Lord Thurlow observed (y), "If one man having debts takes another into partnership with him, a very little matter respecting those debts will make both liable."

A partner ceases to incur liability upon his dissolving the partnership, removing his name from the firm, and giving proper notice of the dissolution (z); for, until the world is duly informed thereof he continues, as we have before remarked, to hold himself out as still in business with his late companions, and will be still responsible for their engagements (a); and, if he do not remove his name from the firm, he gives strangers cause to disbelieve his notice, though he may have promulgated one, and will, therefore, notwithstanding it, continue liable (b). But then this non-removal must, to produce this effect, be the result of his own negligence; for if his late partners wrongfully persevere in using his name that will not bind him (c). Notice of dissolution will not be necessary when the partnership is dissolved by death or bankruptcy (d). It is probable, too, that it is not necessary when the partnership is dissolved by operation of law, such as the decree of the Court, or the outbreak of war, making one or more of the partners alien enemies (e).

Rights of third persons against partners.

To persons who have not dealt with the firm, notice of the dissolution in the Gazette will be sufficient (f), whether they have seen it or not. But the jury may be satisfied that the fact was brought to their knowledge by advertisement in any other newspaper, or otherwise (g). To persons who have so dealt express notice ought to be given (h); and this is usually done by circular letters (i). But if a fair presumption can be raised from other circumstances that the party had actual notice, that will be enough (k). Thus a change in the wording of cheques has been held notice to a creditor who receives them (l).

As to a dormant partner, as his name never appeared in the firm, of course it cannot be removed; and as the correspondents of the house never knew him to be a partner, they need not be informed of his ceasing to be such (m). Though many may have been aware that he was a partner, he will not be chargeable, except by individuals who knew it at the time of entering into their engagements with the firm (n); to such persons he will be liable, if he have not given a proper notice of retirement, or if they have not otherwise acquired knowledge (o), on the principle that a person, who gives to another an authority of a character such as would naturally last, will be estopped from denying the existence of the authority to the prejudice of those who have acted upon it, and who have had no notice of its revocation (p).

On his dissolving the partnership, removing his name from the firm, and duly promulgating notice of his withdrawal, all danger of his liability for the future acts of his companions is at an end (q).

For some purposes the agency of the partner continues after the dissolution. Thus, it has been held that a surviving partner may give a charge on partnership assets to further secure a debt incurred by the partnership in the lifetime of the deceased partner (r). So, too, when a partnership is dissolved by the bankruptcy of a partner, the solvent partner may "get in, and insist on getting in, the assets of the dissolved partnership" (s). Of course the retiring partner will be liable, if he allow the others to go on using his name, notwithstanding the dissolution (t). Lord Kenyon doubted whether a bill, indorsed by one partner in the name of the firm before dissolution, could be negotiated afterwards (u). The Court of Queen's Bench, however, subsequently held that a bill drawn by a partnership before the dissolution might be indorsed after the dissolution, to a person having notice of it (v). Abel v. Sutton (u) and Smith v. Winter (t) were not cited upon the argument of this case, which possibly may hereafter be thought open to review, since it may be argued that all express authority to indorse was put an end to by the dissolution, and all implied authority by the notice.

A retired partner, however, of course remains liable for contracts made by the firm while he continued to belong to it. Yet if the partnership be dissolved in consequence of his death, his personal representative stands in a very different situation. At Law he was completely exonerated from responsibility, the rule there being, that personal claims and liabilities survive. Equity, however, unwilling that this maxim should work injustice, considers the estate of the deceased partner as liable to the demands of the partnership creditors until the debts which affected him at the time of his decease have been fully discharged (x). In strictness, partnership debts are only joint. This appears from Kendall v. Hamilton (y), where it was held that an action and a judgment against two persons who had borrowed money of the plaintiffs constituted a bar to another action brought by the same plaintiffs against a third person, who was a partner with them in the business for which the money was advanced; the circumstance that the judgment was unsatisfied was immaterial; the debt was joint, not joint and several; and it was decided, in accordance with King v. Hoare (z), that the matter having become res judicata, by the judgment against two of the co-contractors, no further action lay against the third. In a certain sense such debts are on the dissolution of partnership by death treated as joint and several.

"This, however," said Lord Cairns, in Kendall v. Hamilton (y), "is only a compendious expression, which must be interpreted with reference to what were the functions of the Court of Equity as to partnership debts. The only interposition of a Court of Equity with regard to partnership debts took place in the administration of the assets, either of the partnership or of a deceased member of the partnership. Where a member of the partnership died, the debts became in the eye of a Court of Law the debts of the survivors; but the survivors, on the other hand, in a Court of Equity, had the right, as against the estate of a deceased partner, to say that his representatives should not withdraw any part of the partnership property until all the debts were paid or provided for. If, therefore, a Court of Equity was administering the assets of a deceased partner, it would, in order to clear his estate, ascertain his liabilities to the partnership, and for this purpose would ascertain the debts due from the co-partnership at his death. From this the transition was easy to giving the creditors of the partnership a direct right, and not merely an indirect right, through the surviving partners, to come for payment against the assets of the deceased partner; and from this again the transition was easy to the expression which said that partnership debts, in the eye of a Court of Equity, were joint and several—not thereby meaning that a Court of Equity altered or changed a legal contract, but merely that the Court, in order, before distributing assets, to administer all the equities existing with regard to them, would go behind the legal doctrine that a partnership debt survived as a claim against the surviving partners only, and would give the creditor the benefit of the equity which the surviving partners might have insisted on" (a).

Rights of third persons against partners.

The decision, therefore, in Kendall v. Hamilton has no application to a case where the partnership is dissolved by death; and a judgment recovered against one partner is no bar to proving against the estate of a deceased partner (b).

Whether, indeed, the claim of the partnership creditors on the separate estate of the deceased shall be postponed to that of his own separate creditors, or whether they shall come in with them pari passu, or whether, lastly, they have any claim against it at all until the insolvency of the partnership estate has been ascertained, are questions which were long unsettled (c). The last of them, however, was resolved by the case of Wilkinson v. Henderson (d), which decided that the joint creditor is not compelled to pursue the surviving partner in the first instance, but may resort at once to the assets of the deceased, without showing that full satisfaction cannot be obtained from the survivor, and may leave the representatives of the deceased to recover what, if anything, shall appear upon the partnership account to be due from the survivor to the estate of the deceased partner. The surviving partners must have been made parties to the suit (e). Since the Judicature Acts a creditor may sue both the surviving partner and the personal representative of a deceased partner, and may obtain judgment against them all (f).

Since the Judicature Act, 1875, in the administration of the assets of a person whose estate is insufficient for the payment in full of his debts, the same rules prevail as to the payment of debts and liabilities as in the case of bankruptcy (g). That is, the separate estate of a deceased partner must be applied in payment of all principal and interest due to his separate creditors before any part can be touched by the partnership creditors (h). On the other hand, the partnership debts must be paid in full before the share of the deceased partner becomes available for his separate creditors (i).

The separate estate of a deceased partner can never be discharged while any partnership debt remains outstanding. Nay, the Court will even reform joint securities, when executed by partners for a partnership debt, by construing them joint and several, so as to bind the executor of a deceased co-partner (j). But such an instrument must have arisen out of some antecedent partnership liability; for a presumption then arises that, as the demand for which the security was given might have been enforced against the estate of a deceased partner, the parties must have intended that the security should be similarly available (k). But where the instrument is pure matter of arbitrary convention, growing out of no such antecedent liability, that presumption does not arise, and then, if it be jointly worded, the Court will not construe it joint and several, but will measure its extent by the terms in which it is conceived (l).

The liability of a retired partner and that of a deceased partner's estate will be reduced by the amount of all payments (m) made by his late companions since the dissolution of the partnership, and appropriated, either specifically or impliedly, to the reduction of the demands upon the firm. Thus, Devaynes and others were in partnership as bankers; Clayton had a running account with the firm, and was in the habit of paying in and drawing out money. At the time of Devaynes' death there was a balance of 1,713*l.* in favour of Clayton and against the firm. After the death of Devaynes, his late partners became bankrupt; but, before their bankruptcy, Clayton had drawn out sums to more than the amount of 1,713*l.*, and had paid in other sums yet more considerable. Upon the bankruptcy of the surviving partners, Clayton was desirous of having recourse to the estate of Devaynes; but it was held, that the sums drawn out by Clayton since the death must be appropriated to the payment of the balance of 1,713*l.* then due; and that, as the total amount of those sums was greater than the balance, the debt due from the firm at the death of Devaynes had been discharged and his estate exonerated; the sums paid in by Clayton since the death constituting a new debt, for which the survivors only could be held liable (n).

There is no fiduciary relationship between a surviving partner and the representatives of his deceased partners. Accordingly, the Statute of Limitations runs in the case of a claim against the latter (p). As to the effect of the Statute of Limitations on a creditor's equity against the estate of the deceased partner, if the firm be indebted to his estate beyond the proportion it ought to bear of the claim, it seems the statute would bar the equity; and it is clear that a payment of part or of interest by surviving members will not deprive the executors of the deceased partner of this defence (q).

D. 178; Pemberton v. Oakes, 4 Russ. 154. Having stated the principles of Clayton's case, Bayley, J., observes, in Simson v. Ingham, 2 B. & C. 65, at p. 72: "There is a third rule, viz., that where one of several partners dies, and the partnership is in debt, and the surviving partners continue their dealings with a particular creditor, and the latter joins the transactions of the old and the new firm in one entire account, then the payments made from time to time by the surviving partners must be applied to the old debt. In that case it is to be presumed that all the parties have consented that it should be considered as one entire account, and that the death of one of the partners has produced no alteration whatever." Nor will this result depend on the knowledge of the creditors of the change which has taken place in the constitution of the firm: Lindley on Partnership, 5th ed. 229. But this is only a presumption; the creditor may decline to treat the whole as one account.

Although, among themselves, partners may, and often do, agree that after the dissolution the credits of the firm shall be received, and its debts paid by one of the late partners only, yet this arrangement does not affect their joint responsibility to third persons, unless such persons agree to exchange the liability of the firm for that of the single partner (r). Though it has been held, that neither acceptance of the single partner's note as a collateral security (s), nor receipt of interest from him on the joint debt (t), nor changing the heading of the account from the name of the firm to that of the single partner, and drawing on him for part of the balance, amounted to conclusive evidence of such an agreement (u), it seems clear, on principle, that, if the creditor be actually a party to the arrangement of the late partners among themselves, their acquiescence in that arrangement would be a consideration for his promise to accept the single instead of the double liability, which contributed to induce them so to acquiesce. Besides which, the liability of a single partner may possibly be more beneficial to the creditor than the joint liability of two, either in respect of the solvency

These cases have been much reflected on, particularly in Hart v. Alexander, 2 M. & W. 484; Lindley on Partnership, 5th ed. 242. The authority, however, of that case, as well as of Lodge v. Dicas, supra, has been much shaken by Thompson v. Percival, 5 B. & Ad. 923, 925, and, it may be added, by Winter v. Innes, 4 M. & Cr. 108-9, and Lyth v. Ault, 7 Exch. 669, which decides that the sole responsibility of one of several parties being different from their joint responsibility is a sufficient consideration for such an agreement.

of the parties, or the convenience of the remedy. Therefore, it has been decided, that if the creditor of a firm, consisting of two persons, expressly agree with them to take, and do take, the separate bill (x) or the sole responsibility (y) of one partner in discharge of the joint debt, his so doing amounts to the discharge of the other partner. Whether such an agreement has been made is a mixed question of law and fact (z). This sort of arrangement was usual under the civil law, and went by the name of Novatio (a).

Though there be no such express agreement, a creditor of a firm may by his conduct elect to sue certain persons, and so be unable to sue others. In Scarf v. Jardine (b) the plaintiff, it was proved, had supplied goods to A. and B., trading as partners; A. retired; the plaintiff supplied goods to the new firm, B. and C., before receiving notice of A.'s retirement. When he did receive notice he sued the new firm. The plaintiff, it was held, was free to sue A. or B. and C., but there was no joint liability; and having elected to sue B. and C. he could not subsequently recover against A.

Lindley, L. J., in his work on Partnership (c) thus sums up the result of the cases:—

"(1) An express agreement by the creditor to discharge a retired partner, and to look only to a continuing partner, is not inoperative for want of consideration; for Lodge v. Dicas (d), has, as to this point, been overruled by Thompson v. Percival (e).

Rights of third persons against partners.

"(2) An adoption by the creditor of the new firm as his debtor does not by any means necessarily deprive him of his rights against the old firm, either at law or in equity.

"(3) And it will certainly not do so if by expressly reserving his rights against the old firm he shows that by adopting the new firm he did not intend to discharge the old firm.

"(4) And by adopting a new firm as his debtor, a creditor cannot be regarded as having intentionally discharged a person who was a member of the old firm, but was not known to the creditor so to be.

"(5) But the fact that a creditor has taken from a continuing partner a new security for a debt due from him and a retired partner jointly is strong evidence of an intention to look only to the continuing partner for payment.

"(6) And a creditor who assents to a transfer of his debt from an old firm to a new firm, and goes on dealing with the latter for many years, making no demand for payment against the old firm, may not unfairly be inferred to have discharged the old firm."

As an entire firm may be bound, so it may also be discharged, by transaction with a single partner. Thus, payment or satisfaction of a debt by one partner is payment or satisfaction by them all (f); so a release or discharge, even without deed, to one of several partners or joint debtors, though the debt be joint and several, is a discharge to them all (g). Though a covenant not to sue an individual may be pleaded by him as a release, yet such a covenant does not release the rest (h).

Section VI.—Rights of Partners against Third Persons.

(A) As to the mode in which rights of partners against third persons may be acquired.—It has been held that, where one party applies to another for a loan, without inquiring whether the money is to be advanced by the lender as an individual or as member of a firm, he is liable either to the individual or to the firm, as the advance may chance to be made (i). It has also been held that, when one partner sells the goods of the firm in his own name, the whole partnership is nevertheless entitled to sue the buyer for the price (k). But this right of theirs does not preclude the buyer from setting off any debt due to him from the single partner, for the existence of that debt may have been his inducement to deal with him (l). Even in cases of collateral liability, where a written agreement is required by the Statute of Frauds, it has been held that the firm may sue upon a guaranty given to a single partner, if there be evidence that it was given for the benefit of all (m). All this results from an universal rule of law, viz., that where a contract not under seal is made with an agent in his own name for an undisclosed principal, either the agent or the principal may sue upon it, the defendant in the latter case being entitled to be placed in the same situation at the time of the disclosure of the real principal as if the agent had been the contracting party (n).

become inoperative as to future events on the incoming or outgoing of a partner (p). The same rule is applied to contracts under seal and simple contracts (q). By the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 4 (r) the Legislature has expressly enacted the above principle. However, a promissory note, given to secure advances made by the firm, will be available for the benefit of future as well as present members, if such clearly appear to have been the intention of the makers (s).

(B) As to the mode in which the rights of the firm against third persons may be determined.—The better opinion, as has been already stated, is that the rights of the firm may bonâ fide be released by any one of the partners (t). Accord and satisfaction, without fraud, to one partner prevent the rest from suing (u). And there is no doubt that payment of a partnership debt to one member is payment to all; and that even after the firm has been dissolved (v), and notwithstanding a clause in the deed of dissolution that another partner shall receive all the joint debts (x). So one partner may give time to the debtor of the firm, as by taking his acceptance (y), or may preclude the partnership from suing by some act which would render it unconscientious in himself to do so (z). Thus, where Jacaud and Blair, partners in one firm, indorsed a bill to Jacaud and Gordon, partners in another firm, and afterwards received effects from the drawer to discharge it, which they converted to their own purposes, it was held that Jacaud and Gordon could not sue the acceptor on this bill. SECTION I.—Their Nature.

Joint Stock Companies—their nature.

A JOINT STOCK COMPANY [established before the passing of the enactments presently mentioned (a), and which has not adopted their provisions] is a partnership consisting of a large number of members, whose rights and liabilities would be precisely the same as those of any other sort of partners, had not their multitude obliged them to adopt certain peculiar regulations for the government of the concern, which are ordinarily contained in an instrument, called a Deed of Settlement. The capital of the company is generally divided into equal parts called shares, a certain number of which is held by each member of the company, and in proportion to these he is entitled to participate in the profits of the undertaking. The immediate superintendence of its affairs is delegated to a portion of the members, called directors, subject, nevertheless, to the general control of the body, assembled at stated intervals, or on particular occasions when they may be convened. The general body of shareholders, except upon such occasions, unlike the members of an ordinary partnership, have no power to interfere in its concerns or to bind the company. Such bodies still subsist (a), and if established before the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, s. 58, which required trading partnerships consisting of more than twenty-five members to be registered, they are legal (b); but the impossibility or great inconvenience of carrying on its business upon such a footing, frequently induced a company to add to the Deed of Settlement an Act of Parliament passed expressly for its purposes.

The vast increase in the number of such bodies, and the importance and extent of the undertakings and business carried on by them in modern times, impelled the Legislature to pass general measures for their regulation, granting them peculiar privileges and powers, but imposing upon them certain rules and obligations.

The first class of joint stock companies subject to distinct legislative enactment were joint stock banks of issue, carrying on business beyond the distance of sixty-five miles from London (c); and subsequently all joint stock banking companies consisting of more than six persons, established since May the 5th, 1844, were regulated by an Act passed in that year (d). This measure continued in force until the year 1857, when the Joint Stock Banking Companies Act, 1857 (e), was passed, subjecting companies formed under the last-mentioned Act, and any new companies, with some slight modifications, to the regulations ordained for other companies by "The Joint Stock Companies Acts, 1856, 1857." In the following year joint stock banks were permitted to register with limited liability, a privilege previously withheld from them (f). Banking companies registered under the Act of 1857 are now registered under the Companies Act, 1862 (g); and by sect. 4 of the latter Act all joint stock banks formed since November 2, 1862, consisting of more than ten persons, must be formed and registered under its provisions, unless established under a special Act or letters patent.

The result of these legislative measures affecting joint stock banking companies is, that those formed under 7 Geo. 4, c. 46, and not registered since, are governed by that Act and their Deed of Settlement. Banking companies formed under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 113, are governed by their Deed of Settlement and so much of the Companies Act, 1862, as applies to companies registered, but not formed under it. Joint stock banks formed under the 20 & 21 Vict. cc. 14, 19, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 91, are governed by their rules and articles of association and the Companies Act, 1862; and those formed under the last-mentioned Act are entirely subject to its provisions.

With respect to other companies, the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110 (i), was passed in 1844, which established a registry of such bodies, and created a uniform system for the regulation of all companies subsequently projected. But companies incorporated by statute or charter, or authorized by statute or letters patent to sue and be sued in the name of some officer, and companies for executing works which could not be carried into execution without obtaining the authority of Parliament, were exempted from these regulations.

Formerly, each company of the latter excepted class was governed by the peculiar provisions of the special Act or charter it obtained. This was found to be very inconvenient, and therefore, in order to produce uniformity, two general Acts, the one termed "The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act" (k), embodying all the clauses usually contained in Acts of Parliament establishing such companies, for the regulation of their proceedings, and the transfer of shares and their general government; and the other termed "The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845" (l), containing provisions as to their taking lands for such purposes, were passed. These Acts apply to all companies established by Act of Parliament for the execution of undertakings of a public nature after the 8th May, 1845, and constitute a code by which such companies are governed. On account, however, of the peculiar nature and importance of railway companies, a third statute, termed "The Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845" (m), has enacted regulations as to the mode of constructing their works, the amount of and means of enforcing tolls and fares, the making of bye-laws, the recovery of penalties and damages, and objects of a like nature. The Regulation of Railways Act, 1873 (n), and the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (o), have further subjected railway and canal companies to the jurisdiction and control of commissioners in the conduct of their business (p).

Joint Stock Companies—their nature.

Bodies, the subject of these ordinances, are not, properly speaking, mercantile companies: hence they do not form a fitting subject of enquiry in the present chapter, even were it possible, within the limits of a work like this, to afford any useful explanation of the system they create, and the decisions upon them.

The statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, above referred to, was superseded by the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1856 (q), which was repealed by the Companies Act, 1862 (r). This latter statute, which is now in force, consolidates the laws relating to Joint Stock Companies, and includes in its operation all companies formed and registered under the Act of 1856 (s), and the Joint Stock Banking Companies Act, 1857. With the exception of companies and partnerships formed under some other Act, or under letters patent, or engaged in working mines within the jurisdiction of the Stannaries (t), every banking company or partnership consisting of more than ten persons, and every other company or partnership, having for its object the acquisition of gain (t), and consisting of more than twenty persons, established since the first of November, 1862, must, and any company consisting of seven or more persons associated for any lawful purpose may (u), be formed and registered under the Act of 1862. Every other company, too, except a railway company (v), whether previously existing, or formed afterwards in pursuance of an Act of Parliament or letters patent, or engaged in working mines within the Stannaries jurisdiction, or otherwise duly constituted by law, and every unregistered company consisting of more than seven members may, with the assent of the shareholders, be registered as a limited, or unlimited, company under its provisions (x). If formed for gain, and consisting of more than twenty members, a company must be registered. A trust association, which purchases the shares of telegraph or railway companies for the purpose of dividing the proceeds of dividends or sales, is not such a body (y). If an association falling within the class requiring registration is not registered, the Courts will decline to recognize its existence by ordering it to be wound up, or otherwise (z).

(s) There was also an intermediate Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 133, which enabled companies to acquire limited liability. Companies formed under that Act are now regulated by the Act of 1862, which has also a limited application to companies registered, but not formed under the above Acts; see sect. 177; and even to unregistered companies: sect. 199.

If not thus registered, the law of companies established under private Acts of Parliament, charters, or letters patent, is that laid down by those instruments. Companies thus constituted certainly differ very materially from ordinary firms; but, so far as their Acts, charters, or letters patent have not provided, they are governed by the ordinary law of partnership.

There is a class of companies popularly known as "private

Section II.—How formed and regulated.

A joint stock company, established before 1st November, 1844, the period prescribed by the first Registration Act (b), was usually formed by Deed of Settlement, as it is called, sometimes accompanied by a Private Act of Parliament or a royal patent. How formed and regulated.

The Deed of Settlement constitutes trustees of the partnership property, directors of the partnership affairs, auditors of its accounts, and such other officers as the objects of the society require, and contains covenants for the performance of their respective duties, which are specifically set out, as are those of the other partners or shareholders; it also defines the number of shares, the power and method of transferring them, and of calling for the instalments required to be made thereon: the mode of convening general meetings of proprietors, their rights when convened, and a variety of other rules, suited to the exigencies of the particular undertaking. As far as the provisions of this instrument extend it is the law by which the partnership affairs are to be governed; when it is silent, the general law respecting partnership is to be followed (c).

Companies registered under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110 (d) were regulated by similar deeds of settlement, and their proceedings in the main continue to be thus governed. They may now, (d) There were a few companies to which modified letters patent were granted under the statutes 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 94; 1 Vict. c. 93; but it is doubtful whether any of them still exist. At all events, they are so few as not to warrant a notice in such a limited work as this.

however, be, and usually are, registered under, and regulated in other respects by, the Companies Act, 1862 (d).

Companies established under the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1856 (e), were formed and regulated by a memorandum and articles of association, which generally contained provisions corresponding to those of a deed of settlement. These companies are now subjected to the operation of the Act of 1862, in the same manner as if they had been registered under it; but the original regulations, so far as they are not inconsistent with the Act, remain in force, with this additional provision, that unlimited companies, whose capital and shares are fixed by their memorandum of association, may, notwithstanding, alter their regulations as to the capital and its distribution into shares; and if the articles of association adopted were those contained in the Act of 1856, the shareholders may vary them by special resolution (f).

With respect to companies formed since November 1, 1862, any seven or more persons (g) associated for any lawful purpose may, by subscribing their names to a memorandum of association and complying with the requisites presently mentioned as to registration, form an incorporated company (h), under the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862. If they be banking companies consisting of more than ten persons, or other companies consisting of more than twenty persons, formed for the purpose of carrying on any other businesses that have for their object the acquisition of gain (i), they must be formed and registered under that Act (k). For this purpose, a memorandum of association (l), which bears the same stamp as a deed, containing the name of the company, the part of the United Kingdom in which its registered office will be located, and the objects for which it is to be established, is to be executed. This instrument, in effect, is a substitute for, and operates as, a Charter of Incorporation, and limits the powers of the body. Therefore the members of the corporation have no power to extend the operations of the company beyond those comprehended within its terms. "The memorandum of association is, under that Act" (the Companies Act of 1862), said Lord Selborne, in The Ashbury Carriage Co. v. Riche (m), "their fundamental, and (except in certain specified particulars) their unalterable law." Any proviso in the articles of association outside these limits,—e.g., a power to pay dividends out of capital, or to extend the business of the company to different matters—will be void (n). It must be signed by seven members at least (o), whose execution of it is to be attested; and the name must not be that of an existing company, unless that body be in the course of dissolution and consents (p).

The liability of the members may be unlimited or limited. It may be limited either to the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares, or to such an amount as the members may guarantee to contribute to the assets of the company in the event of its being wound up. If the liability is intended to be limited, the word "limited" must be the last word of the name of the company (q). Where the limit is by shares, the memorandum of association must state the liability to be limited as well as the amount of the capital, which must be divided into shares of a fixed amount (r). Each member must take at least one share, and write the number he takes opposite to his name in the memorandum of association (s). Where the liability is limited by guarantee, the memorandum must contain a declaration that, in the event of the company being wound up, each member undertakes to contribute towards the liabilities of the company such amount as may be required, not exceeding a specified amount (t). The liability of the company, too, may be limited, but that of the directors or manager or managing director unlimited (u).

The memorandum of association is to be registered with the registrar of joint stock companies (x). With it, articles of association printed, stamped and signed by each subscriber, prescribing regulations for the company in separate paragraphs numbered, may, in the case of a company limited by shares, and shall, in all other cases, be delivered to the registrar. If the company be limited by guarantee, or unlimited, these articles must also state the number of the shares, where the capital is divided into shares, and where not so divided, the proposed number of the members. Forms of articles are given, which may be adopted wholly or in part by the companies to which they are applicable. In the case of a company limited by shares, the articles contained in Table A. of the first schedule, so far as they are applicable, and not excluded or modified by the registered articles (y), become its regulations, to the same extent as if they were its registered articles of association (z).

Joint Stock Companies—how formed and regulated.

As the regulations thus furnished by the Act are generally varied by each company, it would be useless to detail them (z). Suffice it to say that generally they provide for the acceptance, transfer, transmission and forfeiture of shares, and their conversion into stock; and, where the capital is not divided into shares, they define the conditions upon which persons become members of the company. They provide for the making and payment of calls; the increase of capital; the general meetings of the company and the proceedings thereat; the votes of the members; the number, powers, disqualification and proceedings of the directors; the mode in which dividends are to be declared and paid, the accounts of the company kept and audited, and notices to the members given; also the event, if any, upon the occurrence of which the company is to be dissolved.

When registered, the memorandum and articles bind the company and members (a), in the same manner as if each member had executed a covenant to conform to them; and all monies payable under them by the members to the company become debts in the nature of specialties (b).

The memorandum is the charter of incorporation of the company and defines its powers (c). The memorandum cannot be altered (d) except in the following particulars:—The company may by special resolution (e), passed by a majority of three-fourths and confirmed by a simple majority of the members present in person or by proxy at two general meetings, (1) change its name (f); (2) render unlimited the liability of its directors, managers, or managing director (g); (3) repay accumulated undivided profits in reduction of the paid-up capital (h); (4) increase, consolidate, sub-divide, or convert into stock, or reduce the share capital of the company (i).

The registrar retains and registers the memorandum and articles thus delivered to him, and on payment of his fees certifies under his hand that the company is incorporated, and, in the case of a limited company, that it is limited. Thereupon the subscribers of the memorandum, together with such persons as may from time to time become members of the company, are constituted a body corporate with perpetual succession, a common seal, and power to hold lands (k); and the certificate thus issued becomes conclusive (l) evidence that the statutory requirements with respect to registration have been complied with.

Every company must have a registered office, and notice of its situation, and of any change in it, must be given to the registrar (m). A register of members, the most important record of the company, commencing from the registration of the company, is to be kept at the registered office (n) in one or more books, wherein must be entered the names, addresses, and occupations (if any) of the members; the shares, in the case of a company, having a capital divided into shares, held by each member, distinguished by numbers, and the amount paid, or considered to be paid thereon; the dates at which the name of each member was entered, and at which any person ceased to be a member (o).

If the capital be divided into shares, a list must be made once at least in every year of the name, address, and occupation of each person who, on the fourteenth day after the first ordinary general meeting in the year (p), is a member of the company, Within seven days after such fourteenth day in each year (r) this entire list is to be entered on the register, and a copy of it forthwith forwarded to the registrar (s), under a penalty of 5*l.* per diem (t). If the capital of any company be consolidated and divided into shares of larger amount than its existing shares, or any portion of its capital be converted into stock, notice must be given to the registrar, whereupon, in the latter case, the provisions of the Act relating to shares cease as to the capital so converted; but the register and list of members must show the amount of stock held by each member (u). Notice of any increase of capital or stock beyond the registered capital, where the capital is divided into shares, or of any increase in the number of members beyond the registered number, where the capital is not so divided, must be given, within fifteen days, to the registrar, who records the change (x). A power is given by the Companies Act, 1867, to the company by special resolution to reduce the capital, upon an application to the Chancery Division, which creditors, who are to have notice of it, may oppose (y). c. 19). Companies are enabled to cancel lost capital, to pay off capital in excess of their wants, to cancel shares never issued, and to return to shareholders accumulated capital in reduction of paid-up capital. The Companies Act, 1880 (43 Vict. c. 19) permits the return to shareholders of accumulated capital in reduction of paid-up capital. All attempts to reduce the capital of a company by the purchase of its own shares, apparently even though the memorandum professed to authorize such purchase, or by other means than those provided in the above Acts, are invalid (y).

A limited company must not only have the word "limited" the last in its name, but also have that name legibly painted or affixed in a conspicuous position outside every office or place where its business is carried on, under a penalty for each day's omission. The name, too, must be engraved on its seal, and mentioned in all notices, advertisements, official publications, bills, notes, indorsements, cheques, orders for money or goods, bills of parcels, invoices, receipts, and letters of credit, under a penalty of 50*l.* on the officer who uses any other seal as that of the company, or issues or signs any such notice, &c. on its behalf, wherein the name is not mentioned. Moreover, the officer, if it be not paid, will be personally responsible for the amount of any such bill, &c. (z). A register must, under heavy penalties, be kept of all mortgages and specific charges on its property, containing a short description of the property, the amount of the charge, and the name of the person entitled to it (a). Such an omission will not, in the absence of fraud or concealment, invalidate the debentures, even though in the hands of an officer whose duty it was to register (b). The register is to be open at all reasonable times to the inspection of any member or creditors of the company (c); and if such inspection be refused, a

Every limited banking and every insurance company, and deposit, provident or benefit society, before it commences business, and also on the first Monday in February and August in every year, is required to put up in a conspicuous place, in the registered and each branch office or place where its business is carried on, a statement (d) of its liabilities and assets, and, if the capital be divided into shares, the amount of capital and shares, the number of shares issued, the amount per share of calls made, and the sum received. Every member and creditor is entitled to a copy (e) of this on payment of a sum not exceeding sixpence. Each company, not having a capital divided into shares, must, under penalties, keep at its office a register of the names, addresses, and occupations of its directors or managers, and send a copy of the notice of any change in these officials to the registrar (f).

Persons are generally induced to become members of new joint stock companies through the medium of prospectuses, issued by the promoters. subject than that which they choose to convey, that the utmost candour and honesty ought to characterise their published statements" (i). In furtherance of this principle the Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 38, enacts as follows:

(a) "Every prospectus of a company, and every notice inviting persons to subscribe for shares in any joint stock company, shall specify the dates and the names of the parties to any contract entered into by the company, or the promoters, directors, or trustees thereof, before the issue of such prospectus or notice, whether subject to adoption by the directors or the company, or otherwise; and any prospectus or notice not specifying the same shall be deemed fraudulent on the part of the promoters, directors, and officers of the company knowingly issuing the same, as regards any person taking shares in the company on the faith of such prospectus, unless he shall have had notice of such contract" (k).

Two questions have arisen on this section, which extends the liability of agents to cases where the relationship of principal and agent does not exist. The first is, what classes of contracts are included? The literal construction of the section would require the specifying of every contract made by any of the persons named at any time before the issue of the prospectus or notice. There has been much difference of opinion as to the limitations with which the section must be taken. On the one hand, it has been laid down that the section included only contracts by which the companies incur obligations. On the other hand, the section has been held to extend to "every contract made before the issue of the prospectus, the knowledge of which might have an effect upon a reasonable subscriber for shares in determining him to give or withhold faith in the promoter, director, or trustee issuing the prospectus, whether such contract was made by such promoter, director, or trustee before or after he became a promoter, director, or trustee, and whether or not such contract was made on behalf of or so as, if adopted, to impose a liability on the company" (l), and, it may be added, whether in writing or not. The latter seems to be the true view. Who are promoters is in each case a question of fact. The term is "a short and convenient way of designating those who set in motion the machinery by which the Act enables them to create an incorporated company" (m). A promoter may be agent for the vendor of property to a company; the material question is, whether the purchase and the formation of the company are part of one project, or whether they are independent transactions? (n). There may be a promoter within the meaning of the section, notwithstanding the existence of an independent board of directors (o). The remedy under the section is only against the director and promoter, and not against the company. It does not enable a shareholder to repudiate his shares or the company to sue the promoter (p).

As the prospectus forms the basis on which the original shareholders usually agree to take shares, any one of them who has been misled by a misrepresentation, misstatement or concealment of a material fact (q), may, if he use diligence, so soon as he ascertains the real facts, be relieved from his engagement (r).

Joint Stock Companies—rights and liabilities of members among themselves.

So when it has been circulated by the company, any person who has been thus induced to take shares may, upon promptly repudiating them, defend any action against him by the company, providing the winding up has not began (r). Sometimes, too, he may obtain the restoration of any sums he may have paid (s); and, at all events, recover any loss he may sustain as damages against the promoters, directors, or persons who have imposed upon him (t). A person induced by the fraud of the agents of a joint stock company to become a member can bring no action for damages against the company whilst he remains a member, his only remedy is restitutio in integrum and rescission of the contract; if this becomes impossible, as by the winding up of the company or otherwise, his action for damages cannot be maintained against the company or liquidators (u). The authorities show that—(1) when an order is made for winding up a company, the shares cannot be repudiated (x); (2) that when a company cease in fact to carry on business, it is too late to rescind a contract to take shares, though brought about by fraud (y); (3) that when there is no remedy by rescission of the contract, a shareholder cannot recover calls paid (z); (4) that a shareholder induced by fraud to take shares cannot prove for damages in the winding up in competition with other creditors or shareholders, or against the company (a).

been allotted, or the allotment sent to the applicant (c), if the application be not accepted in its terms (d), or if it be subject to a term or condition which is not fulfilled (e).

The purpose of a prospectus being to invite persons to become original shareholders, its office is completed on allotment; and a purchaser of shares has no right of action in respect of any concealment or misrepresentation in the prospectus (f). Should the memorandum of association materially differ from the prospectus, a person who has agreed to subscribe on the footing of it may at once repudiate the shares (g), and demand a return of his deposit (h). So, likewise, where the scheme proves abortive and the project is never carried out. So, if the shares be not allotted within a reasonable time, they may reject them immediately upon notification of the allotment (i).

By sect. 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, every share shall be deemed to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, "unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing and filed with the registrar of joint stock companies at or before the issue of shares" (k). It is not competent to issue shares at a discount.

"The Act of 1867 only regulated the mode of payment, it prescribed that shares must be paid up in cash, unless a contract providing for some other mode of payment had been registered, but it contains no provision exempting shares from being paid up in full. Co. (l), and In re Plaskynaston Tube Co. (m), in which it was held that shares in limited companies could be issued at a discount"(n).

With regard to the rights of members of an unregistered joint stock company among themselves, these are provided for and regulated by their deed of settlement, and, if infringed, must be vindicated in the same manner as the rights of ordinary partners inter se, except always so far as the regulations of the company may have provided the contrary. And whenever there is no Act or letters patent, and the deed of settlement is silent, the general law of partnership prevails, and supplies its omissions. Thus, in the absence of some stipulation to the contrary, each member has a right to inspect the books of the company (o).

It has already been stated that, in the case of companies established under the several Acts of 1844, 1856, and 1862, upon registration the members for the time being become a corporation (p). A corporation aggregate (q) consists of several individuals, united in such a manner that they and their successors constitute but one person in law: a person distinct from that of any of the members, though made up of them all, and whose privileges and possessions, when once vested in it, will be for ever vested, without any conveyance to new successors; for all the individual members that have existed from the foundation to the present time, or that shall ever hereafter exist, are but one person in law; as the river Thames is still the same river, though the parts which compose it are changing every instant (r).

By the name mentioned in the certificate of registration the company must sue or be sued, grant or receive, and do all other acts as natural persons may. Being, however, an invisible body, it cannot manifest its will by oral communication. A peculiar mode has therefore been devised for the authentic expression of its intention, viz., the affixing of the common seal; and it is held that, although the particular members may express their private consents by words, or signing their names, yet this does not bind the corporation; it is the fixing of the seal, and that only, which unites the several assents of the individuals composing it, and makes one joint assent of the whole (s). It is provided that each of these companies shall have a common seal (t), and individual members have, in general, no power to bind their fellows.

With respect to the rights of members of companies established under the Act of 1862, between themselves, it is enacted that the subscribers to the memorandum of association shall be deemed to have agreed to become members (u), and, as soon as the company is registered, shall be entered as such in the register of members. Every person, also, who has agreed (x) to become a member (y), and whose name is entered in the register, is deemed to be a member (z). To constitute an agreement under sect. 37, there must be not merely a proposal to take shares, but notice to the person of acceptance (a). Posting a letter of allotment which does not reach the applicant will be a sufficient acceptance (b). There must be an absolute unconditional agreement (c). As between an individual agreeing to become a member and the company, if that agreement has been obtained by fraud, it is voidable, and he may repudiate the agreement, if he acts promptly (d). But, as in the case of a person who has been fraudulently induced to enter into a partnership, creditors of the firm, who have trusted it, have a right to look to him, and, in the event of the company being wound up, or the directors issue notices calling a meeting to pass resolutions for winding-up, and his name being on the register, he will be a contributory (e). In the interval, however, before any application to wind up, he may, as a rule, withdraw (f). So if the articles of association materially vary from the prospectus upon which he agreed to take shares, he may disclaim, unless he be guilty of laches (g). There can be no agreement within the meaning of sect. 47 unless the allottee is capable of contracting. One who, while an infant, has accepted shares may repudiate them, if he does upon coming of age nothing inconsistent with repudiation (h). Where the holding of certain shares is a necessary qualification of the office of director, any one who acts as such will, not necessarily, be held to have agreed to take such shares (i).

The shareholder's rights, after he is so registered, are only partially defined by the statute itself; his powers and privileges are more explicitly stated in the articles of association. As these, however, differ in the case of each company, and may be altered by subsequent special resolutions, it would be useless to detail them. The articles may explain or supplement, but cannot control the general provisions of the statute and the conditions contained in the memorandum of association which prescribe them (k). Subject to any reasonable restriction that may be imposed, each shareholder is entitled to inspect the register of members, and have a copy of any part of it (l); if the company be limited, to inspect the register of mortgages (m); if the company be a limited banking or insurance company, to have a copy of the half-yearly statement (n), and every member may require to be supplied with a copy of the memorandum and articles of association (o).

Notice must be given to him of the general meetings of the company, and of special resolutions which it is intended to propose at them (p). Upon his application he is to be furnished with a copy of such resolution (q), and he is entitled to be present and vote at these meetings, so that he may have a voice in, and exercise control over the proceedings of the company.

In order to enable the members effectually to ascertain the state of its affairs, upon the application of persons holding not less than one-fifth, or, if a banking company, one-third of the shares, or of one-fifth of the members, if the capital is not divided into shares, the Board of Trade may appoint inspectors to examine the books and documents of the company, and its officers and agents on oath, and report their opinion to that Board. A copy of this report is to be sent to the company, and, if they desire it, to the shareholders requiring the investigation, who are to defray the expenses, unless the Board of Trade directs them to be paid by the company (r). The company also may by special resolution appoint inspectors with like powers to report to such persons as it may direct (s). Copies of these reports, under the company's seal, are admissible in any legal proceedings to show the opinion of the inspectors (t). The members have likewise power, at a general meeting, to resolve that the company shall be wound up, by petition to the Court (u), or voluntarily (x).

As the management of a joint stock company is confided to the directors and their agents, and the bulk of the shareholders must necessarily continue passive, the Courts of equity are very strict in enforcing the due execution of the trust reposed in those functionaries (c). Though not trustees in all respects (d), they are liable to refund money misappropriated from the purposes of the company (e); and they may be restrained from using their power improperly (f). But directors will not be visited with the consequences of a mere error of judgment, when they have acted bonâ fide, and intended to do what was right and best for the company (g).

The chief, or one of the chief, questions which commonly occurs between the company and its individual members relates to the payment of money due from them in respect of their shares. The powers of the directors to make calls must be strictly followed (h). To use the expression of Lord Denman, in Meigh v. Clinton (i), it "is a specific power, and must be strictly pursued." Accordingly calls—and the same is true of forfeitures—of shares can be validly made only by directors who have been properly appointed, and by the number, if any, of directors required under the articles of association for the transaction of business (k). The liability of the shareholders or subscribers depends, of course, mainly upon the deed (l) of settlement or articles of association.

Joint Stock Companies—rights and liabilities of members among themselves.

The Companies Act, 1862 (m), on the subject of calls, provides that the memorandum and articles of association, when registered, bind the company and shareholders to the same extent as if each shareholder had signed and sealed them, and all moneys payable by members in pursuance of the regulations of the company are in the nature of specialty debts (n). And in an action for the recovery of calls, or other money due from a member, it is not necessary to set forth the special matter: it suffices to allege that he is a member, and indebted in respect of a call or other moneys due, whereby an action or suit has accrued (o). To such an action a plea that the defendant was induced to hold the shares by the fraud of the company, who are the plaintiffs, is a good answer if the defendant has repudiated the shares in time (p).

Where there was no express prohibition, it was held that the calls might be made payable by instalments, or to take effect in futuro (q).

The liability to calls as made by the directors is confined to the amount of each share, if any precise limit be prescribed by the deed or articles, though the company be not registered as limited; but in that case the shareholder may become liable under a winding up to an unlimited contribution, equally with his fellow members, until the debts of the company be liquidated.

Generally the directors are empowered by the articles of association, if calls be unpaid, to declare (r) the shares of defaulters forfeited (s). This power is treated strictissimi juris, and must be closely followed (t). In one case a forfeiture for non-payment of costs was vitiated by the fact that the call required payment of interest from the date of the call instead of the day appointed for payment, as specified by clause 17, Table A, of the Act (u). The Court will not allow this power to be exercised merely in order to enable a shareholder to escape liability (v). Where a shareholder has stood by so long that his conduct is in effect an intimation that he acquiesces in the forfeiture and abandons his interest, he will be unable to avail himself of informalities in the forfeiture; but if he has a legal, executed interest, mere laches will not disentitle him to relief (w). The usual provision is that a certain number of days' notice shall be given to pay (x), and that if the call be not paid, the shares will be forfeited. The circumstances of such a notice having been given afford a defence in an action for the calls (y). Unless the contrary is clearly provided, the company may not, after the exercise of its right of forfeiture, sue for calls (z).

The shares in these companies, unlike an ordinary partnership, are generally transferable without the consent of the rest of the body (a), and the only obligation is to find a legally competent transferee (b). The Companies Act, 1862, provides (c) that companies registered under the prior Joint Stock Companies Acts (d) may cause their shares to be transferred in the manner previously in use, or such other manner as they may direct; and that the shares or interest of a member (e) of any company formed under that Act of 1862 may be transferred in manner provided by its regulations; also, that the interest of a member may, on his decease, be transferred by his personal representative, as if he were a member (f). In the Table A. (g) there are regulations on this subject, which are usually adopted in articles of association: they prescribe a form of transfer, and provide that the company may refuse to register the transfer of his shares made by a member indebted to the company (h). Ordinarily, therefore, a member has an absolute right to transfer his shares to whomsoever he pleases, even a pauper, provided the sale be out and out and there be no trust (i), and the directors have no discretion in the matter. Often express power is given them to reject a proposed transferee (k), but this they ought not to exercise without good reason, and the Court will interfere if they act from improper motives, or arbitrarily or capriciously (l).

The right to transfer comes to an end when a company has become insolvent, and stopped payment, though the winding up has not begun (m). Until the name of the transferee is placed on the register, he does not become a member (n); he cannot recover any profits, or act as a member; and the vendor continues liable as such. In order to settle disputes as to the liability or right to be registered, and to prevent improper refusals or delay in this respect, section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, provides that if the name of any person without sufficient cause be entered, or omitted to be entered, or if default be made, or unnecessary delay (o) take place in removing any person's name from, or entering any person's name on (p), the register, he or any member may apply to the Court, or to a Judge at Chambers, who may (q) order it to be rectified (r). In this proceeding the Court may decide any question of title (s) necessary to be decided for such rectification (t), or may direct an issue to settle it (u). There is, moreover, a regulation that the Court may make the company refusing to register pay all the costs of the application and any damages the party aggrieved may have sustained by the default or unnecessary delay in registering. A shareholder who has agreed to sell his shares, and executed a transfer to the purchaser, may sue him for a specific performance, and require him to be registered (x), unless in the interval an order has been made for winding up the company or it is insolvent, in which event the vendor must look to the purchaser for an indemnity (y).

1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44, sub-s. (iii.) (b). In the absence of any enactment they are personal property (c), and transferable by parol (d). An action, therefore, for not accepting them may be maintained by the vendor upon a verbal agreement to purchase them (e); and a promise will be implied on the part of the vendee to indemnify him against calls (f). By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 29, s. 1 (Leeman's Act), contracts for the sale of bank shares must specify the numbers of the shares (g). It would appear that whether the sale is or is not on the Stock Exchange, the seller of shares is not bound to procure the registration of the transferee; all that he is bound to do is to execute a valid transfer and hand it to the transferee (h). It has been decided that, when shares are, by the provisions of an Act of Parliament, transferable by deed only, the purchaser must tender a conveyance to the seller for execution before he can sue for not transferring them, even though the Act makes the shares personal property (i); and that a sealed instrument of transfer, having the name of the vendee in blank at the time when it is sealed and delivered, is invalid as a deed (j). "This is an attempt," said Parke, B., "to make a deed transferable and negotiable like a bill of exchange or exchequer bill, which the law does not permit" (k).

The title of the transferee in such circumstances is only an equitable title (k); and he has no right to require the company to enter the shares in his name in the register. In the absence of any provision requiring the transfer to be by deed, it may be by writing only, and if the name of the transferee be in blank it may be afterwards filled in, though the instrument be in fact under seal (l). The transferee may, however, under certain circumstances be estopped from taking advantage of a defect in the transfer, even as against the company (m).

A company may issue to shareholders certificates under the common seal of the company for the purpose of enabling them to deal readily with their shares (n). The company will be estopped from denying the truth of statements in these documents; and a person who purchases and pays for shares specified in such a certificate may recover from the company if it turn out that it has been issued to a person not entitled (o).

Section IV.—Rights against and Liabilities to Third Parties.

Rights against and liabilities to third parties.

The liability of a member in a projected company begins with the commencement of the company. He is not responsible for contracts made before that period by its intended members or directors, while preliminaries, on the accomplishment of which he had agreed to join, are unaccomplished (p). And though, in the absence of acquiescence (q), no partnership takes place till the preliminaries are completed, when the partnership has once begun, every member is liable in respect of a contract made by the directors or agents in the usual course of business (r). But the company will not be bound if the acts of the directors are outside the articles of association and memorandum. "Those who deal with them (companies) must be affected with notice of all that is contained in those two documents" (s). Persons who consent to become directors or members of the provisional committee of a projected company not yet formed, do not thereby authorize the other promoters or members of the managing committee to engage their credit, even for things necessary to establish the company (t). The bare fact of allowing their names to be published to the world as directors or members of such a committee, and accepting shares and paying a deposit upon them (u), will not warrant a verdict against them (v). But these, and any other acts they may have done in relation to the proposed company, raise a question of fact, whether they authorized the pledging of their credit for matters necessary to the formation of the company (w). So permitting their names to be inserted in a prospectus, which represents certain persons as the agents of the committee, e.g., solicitors and secretaries, should be submitted to the jury, and it is for the jury to say whether, by so doing, they did not intend to authorize those agents to do all such things on their behalf as are usually done by them in similar cases. Also if the prospectus states the names of an acting committee, it is a question of fact, whether the meaning of that is, that the acting committee is to take the whole management, to the exclusion of the provisional committee, their provisional character having ceased, in which case they would not be liable; or that the provisional committee have appointed the acting committee, or the majority of it, on their behalf and as their agents, in which event they would be liable upon contracts made by them as such agents. It is, however, quite clear that they cannot be charged for goods supplied, or debts incurred previously to their consenting to act (x); although the regulations of the company usually empower the directors to pay the expenses of getting up and registering the company (y), a provision which does not give promoters or third parties a right of action against the company. A company cannot ratify contracts made before it existed (z).

The members of an unregistered joint stock company, when once the company is established, have no peculiar rights or liabilities, but, like members of an ordinary firm, are entitled to the benefit of all its contracts, and responsible for engagements made by the agents of the concern and for its purposes (a). A joint stock company cannot, as we have seen, undertake a new branch of business outside the terms of the memorandum of association without the consent of all its members. Where a life assurance company, in pursuance of a resolution passed at an extraordinary general meeting, issued policies of marine assurance, it was held that the general body of shareholders were not bound by such policies, and the holders were not entitled to prove against the assets of the company in respect of losses within such policies (b).

registration, and then the subscribers of the memorandum, together with any other persons who become members, are constituted a body corporate (c). As individual partners, therefore, they incur no personal liability to third persons for its engagements, except in one instance prescribed by the Act: viz., when the company carries on business for more than six months after the number of members is less than seven (d). The body corporate alone becomes liable to be sued for its debts or engagements, and the members can only be compelled to contribute to the liquidation of them, either by calls made by the directors while the company is proceeding, or by calls made upon them as contributories under a winding up. The extent of a shareholder's liability is either unlimited, or, in the case of a limited company, restricted to the amount unpaid on the shares held by him, or of a specified guarantee. If the existing members are unable to satisfy the contributions required to be made, persons who have ceased to be such within one year previous to the commencement of the winding-up may be made contributories in respect of debts or liabilities incurred by the company before they ceased to be members (e); but in limited companies neither past nor present members can be required to contribute towards them beyond the amount unpaid on their shares, or the amount they have guaranteed (f). By the Companies Act, 1879, it is provided that a bank of issue registered as a limited company shall not be entitled to limited liability in respect of its notes; the members continue liable in respect of the notes as if the company had been registered as unlimited (g).

The directors of a registered company incur no liability to third persons, and are only contributories in their character of members (h). If, however, any director, manager, or officer of a limited company, or any person on its behalf, sign, or authorize to be signed on behalf of the company, any bill of exchange, promissory note, indorsement, cheque, or order for money or goods, wherein its full name is not mentioned, he is personally responsible for the amount, if it be not paid by the company (h). Unless the deed of settlement or articles of association provide for the giving of bills or notes, or the business to be carried on necessarily requires it, the company cannot be bound by such instruments (i). Directors who accept bills on behalf of a company thereby represent that, as a matter of fact, they have power so to do, and if this be false the directors are personally responsible to persons who have acted upon the representation (j). With regard to such instruments, the Companies Act, 1862 (k), provides that a note or bill shall be deemed to have been made, accepted or indorsed on behalf of a company registered under it, if made, accepted or indorsed in the name of the company by any person acting under its authority, or if made, accepted or indorsed by or on behalf or on account of the company by any person acting under its authority (l).

With regard to the borrowing of money, unless part of or incidental to the ordinary business of the company, e.g., a banking company (m), or powers be given them by the deed or articles to do so, the directors have no authority to pledge the credit of the shareholders by borrowing money, even though it be necessary to enable them to carry on the affairs of the company (n).

Joint Stock Companies—rights against and liabilities to third parties.

"There can be no doubt that where there is an express provision against borrowing, it must be obeyed," says Lord Selborne. "There is also no doubt that where there is not an express prohibition against borrowing in a case of a company or a society constituted for special purposes, no borrowing can be permitted without express authority, unless it be properly incident to the course and conduct of the business for its proper purposes" (o). Where the borrowing power of a company is limited, persons dealing with the company are bound to ascertain its exact power. If the power is exceeded they cannot recover against the company (p), though they are entitled to assume that powers which the company is authorized to confer upon its directors have been duly conferred (q). If the authority of directors to borrow is limited, but the company's powers are not so, the latter may ratify borrowing by the former (r).

In Tredwen v. Bourne (s), Lord Abinger expressed an opinion that the question whether the directors of a mining company have, in the absence of express provision, power to bind the company by dealing on credit, must depend on the general nature of the concern, and is a matter for the jury to decide on; "and, I think," added his Lordship, "they would not have had much difficulty in saying, that it is in the general nature of mining concerns to deal on credit for the purpose of carrying on their business." In the subsequent case of Hawken v. Bourne (t), proof to that effect was given in a Cornish case.

through the medium of the directors or their agents only, the contract of a private member would in no case bind the others or the company, unless recognised. This observation appears to be in some degree sanctioned by the judgment in Bain v. Cooper (t). It has been expressly decided, that an agent appointed by the directors has no implied power to borrow money for the use of a mining company, however urgent may be the necessity (u).

Being incorporated, registered companies are invested with the power which belongs to corporations, of speaking and contracting by means of their common seal, and also, without that formality, of doing such other acts and making such other engagements of an ordinary nature as convenience, almost amounting to necessity (x), requires. If, too, the nature of the business in which such an association is engaged raise a necessary implication that, in certain cases, it was the intention of the members that this formality should be dispensed with, contracts or instruments made without it in such cases will be binding on the body (y).

A trading corporation may differ from others as to its powers of contracting, and its remedies on contracts relating to the purposes for which it was formed (z). Thus, such a corporation may, in some cases, without express powers bind itself by promissory notes (a) and bills of exchange (b); and it was even held, that the Bank of England might, without deed, appoint an agent for such purposes (c). But a non-trading corporation will not have these extraordinary powers, unless they are expressly given, or the ordinary nature of the business in which it is engaged raises a necessary implication of their existence (d). There are other acts, mostly of a trifling nature, which every corporation may do without seal, or even writing. Such, it has frequently been said, is the hiring a common servant, or the appointment of a bailiff to distrain (e); yet it is so doubtful what acts are included within this exception, and the authorities are so conflicting (f), that it is impossible to speak on the subject with confidence. Every exception of this kind stands on the ground of necessity (g).

In general such bodies are liable, not only to actions for debts or obligations, but also for wrongs committed by their command, or for wrongs done (h), or injuries (i) arising from the negligence or misconduct of their servants in the course of their business. porations, induced the legislature to make an express provision as to contracts by registered companies, viz., that contracts which, if made between private persons, would be required to be under seal, may be made under the seal of the company: if they would be required to be in writing and signed, they may be in writing, signed by any person acting under the express or implied authority of the company; and contracts which would be valid if made between private persons, although made by parol only, may be so made by any person acting under the express or implied authority of the company. Contracts entered into in these several ways may, in like manner, be varied or discharged (l).

Unless empowered by the deed of settlement or articles of association, or the consent of the body, individual members (m) or directors have no power to bind the company, and any contract they may enter into will not be obligatory upon it. "All who have dealings with a joint stock company," said Campbell, L. C., in Burnes v. Pennell (n), "know that the authority to manage the business is conferred upon the directors, and that a shareholder, as such, has no power to contract for the company. For this purpose it is wholly immaterial whether the company is incorporated or unincorporated." The directors, of course, by the regulations, have power to carry on the business of the company (o); but, almost universally, this power must be exercised at a board duly convened, at which a prescribed number are present and concur (p); and it has been held that even a deed under the seal of the company, executed at a meeting at which the number so required are not present, will not bind the body (q). But a proviso as to the number of directors may be merely directory (r). The mere acceptance, too, of goods by a company, and the fact that they have been used by it, will not bind it (s); nor will an acknowledgment of the price of them as a debt by a meeting of the directors, consisting of a less number than that required by the deed or articles to transact business, enable the person supplying them to maintain an action against the company (t).

Joint Stock Companies—rights against and liabilities to third parties.

The liability of a member of an unregistered company (u), not regulated by any Act of Parliament or chartered, will, in the absence of any special arrangement, be determined in the same manner as that of an ordinary partner (x). But such a company may be wound up under the provisions in the Companies Act, 1862 (y), when all proceedings by action or suit against the members may, after the presentation of the petition for winding up, be restrained by the Court, and after the order for winding up no action or suit can be commenced or proceeded with against a contributory (z) without the leave of the Court, and the affairs of the company are then wound up in the same manner as a registered company is wound up by the Court. Against registered companies actions or suits may be brought for the recovery of any claims or demands, either by third persons or their own members, and execution may be issued upon judgments obtained against them, under which their property may be seized and sold.

The only means now afforded to the creditor of procuring satisfaction of his demand, if a registered company has no available effects, are proceedings to wind it up (a). When and how such proceedings may be adopted, who are the persons liable to contribute under them, and what is the extent of their liability, and the mode in which it is enforced, will be shown in the next section (b). Upon the presentation of a petition for winding up by the Court, and before any order for winding up, the Court may stay all actions and suits against the company (c); and after an order for winding up by the Court or under its supervision (d), no suit or action against the company may be commenced or proceeded with without the leave of the Court (e). The mode, then, to be adopted by the creditor is to prove his demand, and for this purpose provision is made that all debts and claims, present and future, certain or contingent, ascertained or sounding in damages (f), may be proved on a just estimate of their value (g). This proof the creditor must prefer on or before a day fixed by the Court, or he will be excluded from the benefit of any distribution made before proof (h). After payment of all these demands upon the company and the costs of winding up, any surplus that may remain is distributed among the parties entitled thereto (i).

Joint Stock Companies—rights against and liabilities to third parties.

Section V.—How wound up and dissolved.

How wound up and dissolved.

As to the dissolution of a joint stock company, not regulated by the Acts above mentioned, in the deed of settlement of every unregistered company, if it be properly framed, clauses will be found providing a mode by which it may be dissolved. Whatever those provisions may be, they must be strictly pursued (m). Resolutions, even of general meetings, to reduce the capital or the number of shares prescribed by the deed, will not bind persons who are absent: and such acts do not bind the company, but are wholly inoperative and void (n). However well framed provisions of this sort might be, numerous difficulties presented themselves in carrying them out. Recourse to the ordinary tribunals was rendered hopeless, in consequence of the necessity of including every member as a party in a suit for a dissolution. Moreover, individuals who were compelled to pay more than their just proportion of the liabilities, were practically without means of effectual redress.

To obviate these inconveniences, various measures were passed for the bankruptcy (o) and winding up (p) of companies; but these are now superseded by the Companies Act, 1862, which provides a system for winding up and dissolving not only registered companies, to be presently detailed, but also enacts that any unregistered partnership, association or company consisting of more than seven members, except a railway company incorporated by Act of Parliament, may be wound up by an order of the Court of Chancery in any one of three events (q).

Joint Stock Companies—how wound up and dissolved.

First, when the company has dissolved or has ceased to carry on business, or is carrying on business only for the purpose of winding up its affairs.

Secondly, whenever the company is unable to pay its debts. The Act declares that a company shall be deemed unable to pay its debts under the following circumstances :—(i.) Whenever a creditor to whom a sum exceeding 50*l.* is then due, has, by leaving at the principal place of business or by delivering to the secretary, or some director, or principal officer, or otherwise as the Court may direct, served a demand under his hand for payment, and the company has neglected for three weeks to pay or to secure or compound for the same to the satisfaction of the creditor. (ii.) Whenever an action or other proceeding has been instituted against a member, for a debt due from the company or from him in his character of member, and notice in writing thereof has been served on the company in the manner last mentioned, and the company has not within ten days secured or compounded for such debt or demand, caused the action, &c., to be stayed, or indemnified the defendant to his reasonable satisfaction against the action, &c. and costs. (iii.) Whenever execution or other process on a judgment, &c., obtained by a creditor against the company, or a member as such, or any person authorized to be sued as nominal defendant on behalf of the company, is returned unsatisfied. (iv.) Whenever a customary decree or order absolute for the sale of the machinery, &c. of a mine has been made in a creditor's suit in the Stannary Court. (v.) And lastly, whenever it is otherwise proved to the satisfaction of the Court that the company is unable to pay its debts (r).

Thirdly, whenever the Court thinks it just and equitable that the company should be wound up.

The course of proceeding and the powers of the Court are the same as those applicable to registered companies wound up by the Court, presently described; but an unregistered company, unless specially registered (s), as it may be for the purposes of winding up, cannot be wound up under the clauses enabling companies to wind up voluntarily, or under the supervision of the Court (t). For the purpose of determining the Court having jurisdiction in the winding-up of an unregistered company, the company shall be deemed to be registered in that part of the United Kingdom where its principal place of business is situated (u).

In such a winding-up, every one who is liable at law or in equity to pay or contribute (x) to the debts or liabilities of the company, to the adjustment of the rights of the members, or the costs of the winding-up, is a contributory to the extent of such liability; and in the event of the death or bankruptcy of any contributory, or the marriage of a female contributory, the personal representatives, heirs, devisees, trustees or husband, as the case may be, are liable, as in the instance of a registered company (y).

The Court, upon the application of any creditor, may, after the presentation of the petition and before making an order for winding up the company, stay any legal proceedings against a contributory or the company (z); and after an order for winding-up has been made, no such proceedings for a debt of the company can be commenced, or proceeded with, against a contributory without the leave of the Court (a). The Court may, by the original, or by a subsequent order, direct that all the property and things in action of the company shall vest in the official liquidators, who may then, giving such indemnity as the Court directs, bring and defend in their official names all legal proceedings necessary for winding up the company and recovering its property (b). These provisions for winding up unregistered companies are expressly declared to be in addition to, and not in restriction of, the powers conferred on the Court and the official liquidator in the winding up of registered companies, all of which may be exercised in the winding up of unregistered companies (c). Under these provisions, when the affairs of the company have been completely wound up, the Court is to make an order that the company be dissolved (d).

Registered companies may be wound up in one of three modes, viz., by the Court; or voluntarily by the company; or by a voluntary winding-up, continued under the supervision of the Court. The Court invested with this jurisdiction is the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, or if the company be a mining company subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries, that Court, unless the Vice-Warden certifies that the company may be more advantageously wound up in Chancery (e). A judge in chambers may exercise all the powers of the Court (f); but after an order for winding-up has been made, the Court may direct that all the subsequent proceedings shall be conducted in the Court of Bankruptcy for the district within which the registered office of the company was situate (g), or a county court (h).

The circumstances under which a registered company may be wound up by the Court are (i)—

1. Whenever the company, in general meeting, has passed a special resolution, requiring the company to be wound up by the Court (k).

2. Whenever the company does not commence its business within a year from its incorporation, or suspends its business for the space of a whole year (l).

3. Whenever the members are reduced in number to less than seven (m).

4. Whenever the company is unable to pay its debts (n).

5. Whenever the Court is of opinion that it is just and equitable (o) that the company should be wound up.

The fourth of these events is defined to be, (i) whenever a creditor, to whom a sum exceeding 50*l.* is due at law or in equity by the company, has served on the company, by leaving at their registered office, a demand under his hand requiring payment, and they have, for three weeks, neglected (p) to pay the sum, or secure or compound for it to the satisfaction of the creditor; or (ii) whenever execution issued on a judgment, decree or order obtained in any Court by a creditor in any proceeding instituted by him against the company, is returned unsatisfied in whole or in part; or (iii) whenever it is proved to the satisfaction of the Court that the company is unable to pay its debts (q).

The course of proceeding is by a petition (r), which may be presented by the company, or by one or more of the creditors, or contributories, or by these or any of them jointly or separately. Every order which may be made on any such petition operates in favour of all the creditors and all the contributories, in the same manner as if it had been made on the joint petition of a creditor and a contributory (r). Over this petition the Court has complete control; the Court may dismiss it with or without costs, or adjourn the hearing, and make any interim or other order which is thought just (s). The Court has a discretion in the matter; any unpaid creditor is not entitled to an order ex debito justitiæ, and it will not be made if the winding-up would be inexpedient and opposed to the general wishes of the creditors (t). The winding-up is deemed to commence upon the presentation of the petition (u). In the interval between this

When the order for winding up has been made, no proceeding against the company can be commenced or prosecuted (b) without leave of the Court, and subject to such terms as it may prescribe; and (c) when a company is being wound up by the Court, or subject to its supervision, any distress, sequestration, or execution (d), &c. put in force against its effects, after the commencement of the winding-up, shall be void (e). In order to conduct the process of winding up, the Court appoints one or more "official liquidators," either provisionally or otherwise, and determines what security they are to give, and their remuneration. It may remove (k) them and supply vacancies, and, where there are several liquidators, declare whether they are to act jointly or alone (l). These officers are described, not by their names, but as the official liquidators of the company, and they are to take into their custody all its property, and perform such duties as the Court imposes (m). With the sanction of the Court, they may (n) compromise any claims or demands by or against the company; bring and defend legal proceedings in its name and on its behalf; carry on the business, so far as may be necessary for beneficially winding it up; sell its property (o); do all acts, and execute all necessary documents in the name of the company, and use its seal; in the case of the bankruptcy of a contributory, prove for any balance as a separate debt, and receive the dividends; draw, accept, make and indorse bills or notes which will bind the company; raise money on the security of its assets; in their official name take out letters of administration to a deceased contributory, and take any other step necessary for obtaining the moneys due from a contributory or his estate; and do all other things necessary for winding up the company's affairs and distributing its assets (p). The Court may order that they may exercise any of the above powers without its intervention, and, where an official liquidator is provisionally appointed, may limit his powers (q). With the approval of the Court the liquidators may appoint a solicitor to assist them (r).

are liable to contribute the funds for the satisfaction of the claims on the company and costs of the proceedings. These persons are called "contributories," and in all proceedings, until it is finally determined who they are, this term includes everybody alleged to be liable to contribute (s). As soon as may be after the order for winding up has been made, the Court settles a list of the persons who are to become the real contributories (t); and in doing this, it distinguishes those who are such in their own right from those who are contributories as representatives, or liable for the debts of others (u). Upon this list everybody will be placed whose name appears, with his consent, upon the register of shareholders, even though, if there be creditors, he may have been induced to take shares by the fraud of the company, or its directors (x). But in settling it the Court is empowered to rectify the register (y), either before or after the winding-up order, if the name of any person has been put or retained upon it improperly, e.g., because he is an infant, and therefore incompetent (z), or because he had not finally (a) agreed to take shares (b), or had agreed to take them on a condition, or subject to terms which have not been fulfilled (c), or the memorandum materially differed from the prospectus on the faith of which he had consented to take shares (d), and he had immediately (e) taken measures to have his name removed, or if his name has been improperly retained upon it,—for instance, after his shares have been forfeited (f), or transferred to another, who ought to have been registered in respect of them,—it will be removed from the register (g). The Court will also put (h) upon the list of contributories the name of every person who, having actually agreed (i) to take unpaid shares, either originally or upon a transfer, ought to be upon the register (j), or having applied for shares in a false or fictitious name (k), or who has been registered as the holder of paid-up, instead of unpaid, shares (l) (unless there has been a compliance with sect. 25 of Companies Act, 1867), or whose name has been improperly or irregularly removed from it as a holder of unpaid shares. The Court has discretion as to the exercise of its jurisdiction under sect. 35, and will exercise it only if "satisfied of the justice of the case" (m).

The present members are included in this list, and form a class, commonly called the A class, but in a second, commonly called the B class, all persons who have, within one year of the winding-up, held unpaid shares, and ceased to hold them, are also placed (n). on the list, become liable to contribute, where the company is not "limited," to an amount sufficient to pay the debts and liabilities, and also the costs of winding up and adjusting the rights of the contributories amongst themselves, with the following qualifications:—That no past member is liable to contribute, if he has ceased to be a member for a period of a year before the commencement of the winding-up (o), or in respect of any debt or liability incurred after (p) he has ceased to be a member. Nor is he liable, unless the existing members are unable to satisfy the contributions required (q).

In the case of a company limited by shares or by guarantee, no person can be required to contribute beyond the amount unpaid (r) on the shares, or the shares and guarantee in respect of which he is liable, except in the case of a limited banking company of issue, the members of which, in addition to their liability as the members of a limited company, are liable for the amount of any notes issued (s). But companies may in policies of assurance or other contracts restrict the liability of the individual members, or render the funds of the company alone liable on such contracts (t).

bankruptcy, concurrently with the winding-up (a), proof may be made against his estate for the estimated value of his liability to future calls (b), and his trustee represents the bankrupt in the winding-up, and becomes a contributory accordingly (c), unless he disclaimed the shares (d). Should the liability be provable, and the liquidator have failed to carry in a proof while the bankruptcy proceedings are pending, the bankrupt, though he obtains his discharge (e), cannot be put on the list of contributories.

When a company limited by guarantee, with a capital divided into shares, is wound up, any share capital not called up is deemed to be assets of the company, and becomes a specialty debt due from each member to the extent of any sums unpaid on shares held by him, and payable when the Court, or the liquidators if the winding-up be voluntary, direct (f). If a female contributory marries, her husband during the coverture is to contribute the same sum as she would have been liable to pay, if unmarried (g).

No sums due from the company to its members, in their character of members, by way of dividends, profits or otherwise, are deemed to be a debt of the company payable to such member in case of competition between himself and any other creditor not being a member; but they are to be taken into account in the final adjustment of the rights of the contributories amongst themselves (h). The Court may require any contributory settled on the list, trustee, receiver, banker, agent or officer of the company to pay or deliver to the official liquidator any sum of money, books or effects in his hands to which the company is primâ facie entitled (i). Orders, too, may be made for payment by the settled contributories of any moneys due from them to the company exclusive of calls; the Court allowing, where the company is unlimited, any set-off, except in respect of dividends or profits, and, if the creditors are paid, allowing any set-off, whether the company is limited or unlimited (i).

Calls may be made by the Court on settled contributories to the extent of their liability, in order to raise the necessary funds for the payment of the debts of the company, the costs of winding up (k), and the settlement of the rights of the contributories (l). The Court adjusts the rights of the contributories amongst themselves (m), and makes such order as to priority of payment of the expenses of winding up out of the estate, as it thinks just (n). Orders for payment of moneys, unless appealed against, are conclusive that such moneys are due, and the matters stated therein are truly stated, against all persons, and in all proceedings, except those taken to charge the real estate of a deceased contributory, whose heirs or devisees are not themselves on the list of contributories, in which case they are primâ facie evidence only (o). The Court may appoint a day before which the creditors shall prove their debts, or be excluded from any distribution made before they have proved (p).

The powers given by this Act are in addition to, and not in restriction of, any other powers at law or in equity of recovering calls and other moneys (q). There may be rehearings of and appeals from any order (r). Orders of the Court may be enforced in Scotland and Ireland (s). oath, orally or by interrogatories, and the answers of such persons may be reduced into writing and be required to be signed by them (u). Provision is also made for the taking of evidence by commissioners (x). In certain cases power is given to arrest contributories and seize their papers (y). Finally, the Court orders the dissolution of the company (z), which order is reported by the official liquidator to the registrar, and by him minuted, and the company is dissolved from the date of the order (a).

The second mode of winding up and dissolving a company provided by the Act, viz., voluntarily, may be adopted in three events: 1. Whenever the period fixed for the duration of the company by the articles of association expires, or the event happens, upon the occurrence of which it is provided by the articles that the company is to be dissolved, and the company in general meeting has resolved that it shall be wound up voluntarily. 2. Whenever the company has passed a special resolution (b) to wind it up voluntarily. 3. Whenever the company has passed an extraordinary resolution (c) that the company cannot, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, and that it is advisable to wind it up (d). The passing of such a resolution, that is, the second or confirmatory resolution, is declared to be the commencement of the voluntary winding-up (e). Sect. 7 of the Companies Act, 1880 (43 Vict. c. 19), mentions a fourth event. When the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies is satisfied that a company is not carrying on business or in operation, he may call on the company to show cause why it should not be struck off the register and dissolved.

business, except so far as may be necessary for beneficially winding it up, and all transfers of shares made after the commencement of the winding-up, without the sanction of the liquidators, are void, but it retains its corporate state until the affairs are finally settled (f). The resolution to wind up must be notified in the "Gazette" (g), and the property of the company is to be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities, and subject thereto, and unless otherwise provided, distributed among the shareholders in proportion to their shares (h). One or more liquidators are to be appointed, and their remuneration is fixed by a general meeting; where several are appointed, any two may act; vacancies (subject to any arrangement with the creditors, presently referred to) may be filled up by a general meeting (i); and the Court, where there is no liquidator, on the motion of a contributory, may appoint one; it may also remove a liquidator for due cause and appoint another (k). The company may, by extraordinary resolution, delegate to its creditors, or a committee of them, the power of appointing liquidators and supplying vacancies and arranging as to their powers (l). Upon the appointment of the liquidators, the powers of the directors cease, except so far as a general meeting or the liquidators sanction their continuance. The liquidators settle the list of contributories, which, when so settled, is primâ facie evidence of the liability of the persons named in it; and they make such calls on the contributories as they deem necessary; pay the debts of the company, and adjust the rights of the contributories inter se (m). ordinary resolution will bind the company, and also the creditors, if acceded to by three-fourths in number and value of them (p), subject to the right of any creditor or contributory to appeal to the Court within three weeks from the date of the completion of the arrangement (q). By the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 104), s. 2, the Court may order a meeting of creditors to be summoned; and if a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of creditors present in person or by proxy agree to any arrangement or compromise, if sanctioned by the Court, it is binding on the creditors, liquidators, and contributories of the company. If applied to by the liquidators or a contributory, the Court may determine any question, or exercise the powers as to enforcing calls or any other matter (r), which it might exercise if the company were being wound up by the Court (s).

The liquidators are empowered (t), with the sanction of an extraordinary resolution of the company, to make compromises with creditors, or persons claiming to be creditors, or having claims (u); and to compromise calls, liability to calls, debts and claims between the company and contributories or other persons apprehending liability to the company, and any question relating to the assets (x). If it be proposed that the whole or a portion of its business or property shall be transferred or sold to another company (y), the liquidators, when authorised by special resolution, may enter into an arrangement that the members may receive shares or a right to participate in the profits, or any other benefit from the purchasing company in lieu of cash (z). Opportunity, however, is afforded to any member dissenting from such arrangement to compel the purchase of his share by the company at a price to be agreed upon, or in default of agreement, to be fixed by arbitration (z). The liquidators may summon general meetings, and must at the end of each year, if the winding-up continue so long, lay before a general meeting an account of their acts and dealings during the preceding year (a); and at the conclusion of the winding-up render an account showing the manner in which the winding-up has been conducted, and the property of the company disposed of, to a general meeting, at least one month's notice of which, and of its object, must be given in the "Gazette" (b). The liquidators must also make a return of this meeting to the registrar, and three months after the date of the return the company is deemed to be dissolved (c).

The voluntary winding-up is no bar to the right of a creditor to have the company wound up by the Court, either compulsorily or under supervision (d). The Court, however, will not, as a rule, make an order for winding up compulsorily or under supervision after a resolution for voluntary winding-up, unless the Court thinks that the resolution was passed fraudulently or creditors support the petition (e). The Court may provide for the adoption in the winding-up of any of the proceedings taken in the voluntary winding-up (f).

Hence arises the third mode of winding-up above alluded to, viz., voluntary, subject to the supervision of the Court, the statute providing that when a resolution to wind up voluntarily has been passed, the Court may, upon petition, make an order that it shall continue, subject to such supervision (g). The making of such an order is purely discretionary on the part of the Court, who will not, without some good reason, interfere with the management by the shareholders of their own affairs (h). matters relating to winding up under its supervision, the Court may have regard to the wishes of the creditors or contributories (i), which it may ascertain by summoning meetings of them. Subject to any restrictions imposed by the Court, the liquidators exercise all their powers as if the winding-up were simply voluntary (j), and therefore, under sect. 159, may make compromises (k), and under sect. 161 arrangements (l), subject to the supervision of the Court (m). In other respects, including the staying of actions and other proceedings, such an order for winding-up has the same effect as an order for winding-up by the Court (n). If the winding-up under supervision be superseded by an order directing the company to be wound up compulsorily, the voluntary liquidators, or any of them, either alone or with others, may be appointed the official liquidators (o).

Where in the course of a winding-up it appears that any past or present director, manager, liquidator, or officer of the company has misapplied any moneys of the company, or been guilty of misfeasance or breach of trust in relation to the company, the Court may, notwithstanding that the offence is one for which the offender is criminally responsible, examine into the conduct of such director or other officer, and compel him to repay such moneys with interest, or make compensation (p). Certain persons had acted as directors without qualifications. This conduct Jessel, M. R., held to be "misfeasance." This, however, was overruled in the Court of Appeal. James, L. J., said, "I am of opinion that the word 'misfeasance' means misfeasance in the nature of a breach of trust; that is to say, it refers to something which the officer of such company has done wrongly by misapplying or retaining in his own hands any moneys of the company, or by which the company's property has been wasted, or the company's credit improperly pledged. It must be some act resulting in some actual loss to the company." Mutilation of, or making false entries in, the books, &c., is a misdemeanour, punishable by two years' imprisonment (r); and the Court may, on application of any person, direct the liquidators to institute a prosecution for any criminal offence committed by any past or present officer or member in relation to the company, and pay the costs out of the assets (s), or, if the company is being wound up voluntarily, the liquidators may so prosecute with the sanction of the Court (t).

On the dissolution of the company, its books, &c., when the company has been wound up by or subject to the supervision of the Court, are disposed of as the Court directs; when the winding-up has been voluntary, as the company directs. After five years all responsibility of the company or liquidators, by reason that the books, &c. are not forthcoming, ceases (u).

SECTION I.—Definition and Character of Agent.

Definition and character of agent.

AN agent is a person authorized to do some act or acts in the name of another, who is called his principal (a). Whatever a man has power to do in his own right, he may (except in one or two very peculiar cases (b)) appoint an agent to do for him. I say in his own right, for one agent cannot nominate another to perform the subject of his agency; vicarius non habet vicarium; delegatus non potest delegare (d). It is true that, when from the nature of his trust or custom of the business or employment, it cannot be expected that he should accomplish it all by his own personal exertions, he will be allowed to employ others to assist him. The above principle is subject to many exceptions. It means that an agent cannot delegate to others duties which he has undertaken expressly or impliedly to perform himself, which is not the case as to many mercantile agencies. As was said in De Bussche v. Alt (e)—

(a) It may be objected that this definition does not include the limited class of "agents" by necessity (see infra), and those who, though not authorized, are regarded as agents if their acts are ratified. See James, L. J.'s remarks in Ex parte White, L. R. 6 Ch. 397, at p. 399, as to the loose use of "agency," and contrast them with the remarks of Jessel, M. R., in Ex parte Bright, 10 Ch. D. 566, at p. 570; Blackburn, J., in Ireland v. Livingston, L. R. 5 H. L. 395; and Cassaboglou v. Gibbs, 9 Q. B. D. 221; 11 Q. B. D. 797.

(b) See 9 Geo. 4, c. 14, ss. 5, 6; Swift v. Jewsbury, L. R. 9 Q. B. 301; Beer v. London Hotel Co., L. R. 20 Eq. 412. Nor could a devise be executed by an agent, the Statute of Frauds expressly requiring the signature of the testator; but now see 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 9.

Definition and character of agent.

"The exigencies of business do from time to time render necessary the carrying out of the instructions of a principal by a person other than the agent originally instructed for the purpose, and when that is the case, the reason of the thing requires that the rule should be relaxed, so as, on the one hand, to enable the agent to appoint what has been termed a 'sub-agent' or 'substitute'; and on the other hand, to constitute in the interests and for the protection of the principal a direct privity of contract between him and such substitute. And we are of opinion that an authority to the effect referred to may and should be implied where, from the conduct of the parties to the original contract of agency, the usage of trade, or the nature of the particular business which is the subject of the agency, it may reasonably be presumed that the parties to the contract of agency originally intended that such authority should exist, or where in the course of the employment unforeseen emergencies arise, which impose upon the agent the necessity of employing a substitute" (f).

(d) Roll. Abr. 330; 9 Co. 76 b; Schmaling v. Thomlinson, 6 Taunt. 147; Catlin v. Bell, 4 Camp. 183; Doe d. Rhodes v. Robinson, 3 Bing. N. C. 677; Ess v. Truscott, 2 M. & W. 385; Cahill v. Dawson, 3 C. B. N. S. 106. This maxim, borrowed from Roman law, has been misunderstood. In regard to mercantile agencies, delegatus potest delegare is nearer the truth. The maxim is quoted as if a maxim of Roman law. But there it had a meaning different from that in which it is generally used in English law.

(f) Neither in the Court below, nor in the Court of Appeal, was it very clearly explained in this case on what ground the principal might sue the sub-agent. Hall, V.-C., in dealing with the point, refers to Story on Agency, sects. 201, 217a, who cites no authority. The case is, so far, difficult to reconcile with New Zealand Land Co. v. Watson, 7 Q. B. D. 374. See also Kaltenbach v. Lewis, 10 App. Cas.

Definition and character of agent.

Where the guardians of the poor of Witney Union employed Kempthorne to draw a specification for a workhouse, and Kempthorne employed Moon to make calculations, the Court of Common Pleas decided that Moon, though he had no communication with the guardians, might sue them for a compensation, having first proved that Kempthorne, in employing him, had acted in accordance with the custom of his trade of an architect; for, said Tindal, C. J., "in contractibus tacité insunt quæ sunt moris et consuetudinis" (g). In these cases, the agent does not so much delegate his agency as exercise a power impliedly contained in his appointment; in doing which, he must act with precaution, and not exceed what is proper under the circumstances of the case, and warranted by the usage of trade.

Some persons may be agents for others who could not act in their own capacity. An infant or feme covert may become an agent, the latter even for her own husband (h). But it has been decided that one of two contracting parties cannot be agent for the other, even with that other's consent, so as to bind him by a writing within the Statute of Frauds (i).

An agent may in general be appointed by bare words, or such appointment may be inferred from the conduct of his supposed principal respecting him, or ordinary course of dealing (j). There are, however, cases in which the nomination must be in writing, or even by deed (k). The appointment of an agent for the purposes specified by the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd sections of the Statute of Frauds must be by writing (l); and it is a general rule that an agent who is to execute a deed (m), or to take or give livery of seisin (n), must be appointed by deed for that purpose. Moreover, as a corporation aggregate can in general act only by deed, its agent must likewise be so appointed (o), though some trifling agencies, even for corporations, may be created without one; and trading companies may in general do all acts without a deed (p). Though an agent cannot bind his principal by deed unless appointed by deed, the deed executed by the agent may bind the principal as a writing (q).

There are two extensive classes of mercantile agents, viz., factors, who are entrusted with the possession as well as the disposal of property, and brokers, who are employed to contract about it, without being put in possession (r). Though brokers are usually employed in the manner just stated, yet every person so employed is not a broker. Thus it would seem that neither auctioneers (s), nor merchants acting by commission from correspondents abroad (t), can properly be called brokers. It is, perhaps, strange that the meaning of the word should not be better ascertained, for, until the passing of the London Brokers Relief Act, 1870 (u), and the London Brokers Relief Act, 1884 (v), it was required by stat. 6 Anne, c. 16, and 57 Geo. 3, c. 60, that brokers in London must be admitted by the mayor and aldermen, paying 5*l.* on admission, and a like sum annually.

Since the 29th September, 1886, the necessity of admission by the court of the mayor and aldermen, and the obligation to pay this sum, are abolished (x). The penalty imposed by the 57 Geo. 3, c. 60, is also abolished; and a stockbroker who has not been admitted may not only carry on business without liability to a penalty, but recover his commission (y).

Definition and character of agent.

Section II.—Rights of Principal against Agent and Sub-Agent.

Rights of principal against agent.

The duties of the agent to his principal must of course depend on the instructions contained, either expressly or impliedly, in his appointment; for, be those what they may, his duty is to carry them into effect, if possible, to the letter (z); unless, indeed, his obedience would involve a fraud on or wrong against third persons, for no contract can oblige a man to make himself the instrument of fraud (a). The appointment is his only authority: it may be general, to act in all his principal's affairs, or special, concerning some particular object; it may be limited, by certain instructions as to the conduct he is to pursue, or unlimited, i.e., leaving his conduct to his own discretion (b); but this discretion should not be exercised at random, for, in the absence of specific instructions, it is his duty to pursue the accustomed course of that business in which he is employed (c). A stockbroker employed to buy or sell on the Stock Exchange may bind his principal by the rules of the Stock Exchange (d); but the principal will not be bound by rules of a market or trade, if they are unreasonable or illegal, and he is not aware of them (dd). The agent, if prevented by some unforeseen obstruction from pursuing the accustomed course, should give due notice to his principal (e). He must possess a competent degree of skill, in order to enable him to do so; if he engage without such skill he is a deceiver, and will be justly liable for the consequences of his incapacity (f). He is, moreover, responsible not only for himself, but for those whom he may employ under him (g), unless he is authorized to employ others; in which case he will be answerable only for negligence or want of skill in choosing them (h). The most satisfactory mode of determining whether he has exercised such skill is, to show by evidence whether a majority, or even a moiety, out of a given number of skilful and experienced persons, would have acted as he has done (i). Of whatever description his authority may be, if he exceed it and any loss ensue, that loss will fall on him (j); though, if a benefit result, he will not be allowed to share it, but must account for it to his employer (k). However, if his principal subsequently recognize his departure from the letter of his instructions, he is exonerated; for omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur et mandato priori æquiparatur (l). And such a recognition may be inferred from the employer's conduct. Thus, the receipt of interest on a sum lent by the agent recognizes the loan (m).

It has been already said, in the chapter on Partnership, that from a person standing in a situation of confidence with regard to another the strictest good faith is required. This maxim applies in full force to agents (n), of whose morals the law is so careful that it will not suffer them even to incur temptation. Thus, an agent is bound to disclose the fact that he is acting for both parties in a contract of purchase and sale (o). So, too, an agent employed to sell is not allowed to be the purchaser, at least not unless he make known that he intends to become such, and furnish his employer with all the knowledge he himself possesses (p), or unless the Court, perceiving that the principal would lose by a re-sale, think fit on that account to uphold the transaction (q). So, neither can an agent employed to purchase be himself the seller, unless there was a plain understanding between him and his principal, and a full disclosure of his interest (r). No usage to that effect will be binding upon the principal. It matters not that he has not been injured; the Court will inflexibly adhere to the rule that no profit can be made by the agent in the course of his agency without the consent of the principal (s). It is important to bear in mind that a contract which has been entered into by an agent who has secretly stipulated for gain to himself is voidable by his principal. "When a bribe is given, or a promise of a bribe is made," said Cockburn, C. J., in Harrington v. Victoria Graving Dock Co. (t), "to a person in the employ of another by some one who has contracted, or is about to contract, with the employer, with a view to inducing the person employed to act otherwise than with loyalty and fidelity to his employer, the agreement is a corrupt one, and is not enforceable at law, whatever the actual effect produced on the mind of the person bribed may be." And if an agent, who is employed to purchase, purchase for himself, he will be considered a trustee for his principal (t). This is in accordance with the rule of the Civilians: Tutor rem pupilli emere non potest: Idemque porrigendum est ad similia, id est, ad curatores, procuratores, et qui negotia aliena gerunt (u). The Legislature has, in one instance, enforced these doctrines, by prohibiting agents, employed to buy or sell cattle in London, from buying or selling on their own account (x); and it has, as we have seen, been held that one contracting party cannot act as the agent of the other, even with that other's consent, so as to bind him by writing within the Statute of Frauds. An agent will not be allowed to dispute the title of his principal to the subject-matter of the agency (y). Thus, a wharfinger who has acknowledged that he holds goods for a particular transferee cannot afterwards refuse to deliver them to him, and, if he do refuse, is liable in trover. Nor can an agent who occupies a confidential position set up in his favour against the principal or personal representatives the Statute of Limitations in an action for an account. To what class of agents this applies is not very clear; it is conceived that the statute does not protect persons occupying a confidential position as agents (z).

It is a very essential part of the good faith required from an agent that he should keep a clear account, and communicate the result from time to time to his employer (a). The agent's duty is to be constantly ready with his accounts. "I should say that if the accounts show that he has money which he ought to pay over, he ought also to be constantly ready to pay" (b). Rights of principal against agent.

In stating this account, the principal will, in the absence of his own express or implied agreement to the contrary (c), be entitled to all profits and advantages made by the agent in (d) the business beyond his ordinary remuneration, and also to every increase made from his own property (e). Thus, an agent who has made interest upon his principal's money will, in general, be obliged to account for it (f). But a mere stakeholder, such as an auctioneer receiving a deposit, will be excused (g); and no interest is due for money which has laid dead in the agent's hands, unless his employment was of such a nature as to render it his duty to invest it (h). It is on this principle that the employer has a right to every increase made from his own property. If he engage a servant or agent, stipulating for his whole time and labour, ex. gr., the master of a ship, and that servant undertake another agency, the first employer will be entitled to retain against the servant any remuneration earned by him in his second occupation (i). The agent will also be charged with all payments actually made to him, and with all losses incurred by his own negligence, or even through the imposition of a forger; for when an agent is called on to transfer his employer's property, by virtue of an authority given to a stranger, he must examine into its validity at his peril (j). But he will not be chargeable with any loss incurred by him, without default or negligence, while he is engaged in the prudent exercise of his discretion, and in pursuance of the regular and accustomed course of trade (k). If he place his principal's money to his own account at his bankers, without any mark distinguishing it from his own, he will be answerable for it if the banker fail; for otherwise he might treat it as his own if the banker's solvency continued, and as his principal's in case of failure (l).

"Wherever a specific chattel is intrusted by one man to another, either for the purposes of safe custody or for the purpose of being disposed of for the benefit of the person intrusting the chattel, then, either the chattel itself, or the proceeds of the chattel, whether the chattel has been rightfully or wrongfully disposed of, may be followed at any time, although either the chattel itself, or the money constituting the proceeds of that chattel, may have been mixed and confounded in a mass of the like material" (m).

The accounts between an agent and his principal might always have been investigated in a court of law by an action of account (n), the foundation of which, according to Gibbs, C. J., was that the party wanted an account and was not able to prove his items without it, or if the principal could prove the items, he might sue in indebitatus assumpsit (o). But if the agent had refused or neglected to account, the principal might maintain a special action against him, for his breach of duty in refusing to account (p), or sue in equity (q). Now in an action a principal may assert any of these claims, and may have a discovery of books and papers, and the benefit of the defendant's oath (r). A few instances of fraudulent omissions or insertions in accounts between principals and agents will warrant the re-opening of accounts which have been long closed (s).

Rights of principal against agent.

As mercantile agents are generally employed in sales or purchases, let us examine somewhat more particularly their duties with reference to those contracts.

Factor's Duties.—A factor is bound to keep the goods entrusted to him for sale with the same care that a prudent man would keep his own (t). He is not liable in case of robbery, fire, or other accidental damage happening without his default (u), unless previous to such damage he had committed some improper act, had it not been for which the property might have escaped; for then he will be answerable (x), and will not be allowed to say, that perhaps it might not have

The liability of carriers and innkeepers is more extensive. As to the former, see Book III., Ch. II., Contracts with Carriers. As to innkeepers, they are bound to keep their guests' property safe from thieves: Calye's case, 8 Rep. 33 a; Richmond v. Smith, 8 B. & C. 9; Kent v. Shuckard, 2 B. & Ad. 803; Jones v. Tyler, 1 A. & E. 522; Farnworth v. Packwood, 1 Stark. The innkeeper is also liable for any loss or injury arising "pro defectu hospitatoris vel servientium suorum," and the loss or injury will he presumptive evidence of negligence: Dawson v. Chamney, 5 Q. B. 164. His liability, however, is now limited to 30*l.*, unless the loss has arisen from wilful neglect, &c., of himself or his servants, or the goods have been deposited for safe custody: 26 & 27 Vict. c. 41, s. 1. escaped even had he acted rightly, for it is a rule of law that no man shall qualify his own wrong (y).

Where goods are consigned to a factor it is his duty to insure them, or at least to make every usual exertion to insure them, at the request of his principal, if in the course of their previous dealings he have been used to do so, or even though he may not have been used, if he have effects in hand enough to cover the expenses of insurance, or if the bill of lading contain a requisition to insure, or if it be sent with an order to that effect, for by accepting the goods under it he agrees to such requisition. In any of these cases, if he neglect to make the fit insurance, he will be responsible for damage which would have been covered thereby (z). And where it is the duty of an agent to insure, it is his duty also to give notice to his principal in case of his being unable to effect an insurance (a). He may be answerable to his principal for the acts of a sub-agent. M. employed R. & Co., bankers in Edinburgh, to obtain payment of a bill drawn by him upon W. C. at Calcutta. R. & Co. accepted the employment, transmitted the bill to C. & Co., of London, who transmitted it to P. & Co., their correspondents in Calcutta, to whom the bill was duly paid. P. & Co. failed. This was held to be no answer to M.'s claim against R. & Co.; with P. & Co. M. had no privity (b).

If the price be limited by the agent's instructions, he must sell for that, and he will not be justified in deviating from his instructions by the circumstance that, after receiving the goods, he has made advances to his principal, of which he has required payment, and informed him of his intention to sell; for although advances made by a factor confer a lien (c) on the goods in his favour, they do not create a pledge. Hence, too, if a factor holding goods with an authority to sell on certain terms, make advances to his principal, the failure of the principal to repay them within a reasonable time after demand does not render that authority to sell irrevocable, but the principal retains his right, in the absence of any express agreement or custom, to dictate and vary from time to time the terms of sale. The factor, therefore, will not be justified in effecting a sale on the original, or on any other terms, in defiance of subsequent instructions, even though, in the exercise of a sound discretion, he may think those terms, and in fact prove them, to be most advantageous to the principal (d). Whether he will be entitled to give a warranty will depend upon what is usual in the particular trade or business (e). If no price be limited, he must sell for what the goods are fairly worth. If the property be of a description commonly sold for ready money only, he must not sell upon credit or barter the goods (f); for an agent employed generally to do any act is authorized to do it only in the usual way of business (g). But if he be factor in a sort of dealing or trade where the usage is to sell upon credit, then if he sell to a person of good credit at the time, he is discharged, and will be entitled to his commission, though such vendee may afterwards become insolvent (h); provided that the credit which he gave was reasonable and usual, and that his principal was made acquainted with the transaction within a reasonable and usual space of time. However, as some merchants do not choose to run this risk, and to trust so implicitly to the discretion of their factors, an agreement called del credere has been invented, the name of which is taken from an Italian mercantile phrase, signifying guarantee, and by which the factor, for an additional premium beyond the usual commission, when he sells goods on credit, becomes bound to warrant the solvency of the purchaser (i). that an agent acting under a del credere commission was not merely in the same position as a surety, responsible only in the case of the default of the purchaser, but that he was liable to his principal in the first instance (k); but that doctrine has been overturned by subsequent authorities (l), which have settled that he is but in the position of a surety (m). Accordingly, a consignee who is free to sell at any price, and at any time he likes, is not a del credere agent (n). If indeed a factor, after the sale, remit his own note or acceptance to his principal for the amount of the proceeds, he will be liable on that, whether employed under a del credere commission or not, and whether the vendee be or be not solvent. For, by giving such an instrument, he lulls all the suspicions of his employer, and causes him to dismiss all care about the solvency of the purchaser (o).

With respect to Purchases.—As no agent can lawfully exceed his orders or authority, it follows that, if he do so, his principal, though he may perhaps insist upon keeping them if he think it for his advantage (p), has a right to refuse the goods improperly purchased (q). It has been said that, in such case, if he have advanced money on them, he may, instead of returning, take upon himself to dispose of them, as factor for the agent who transgressed his orders (r). But then he must repudiate the transaction, and give notice of his disagreement to the agent within a reasonable time, else he will be taken to have adopted it, and the loss, if any, will fall upon himself (s). It has been intimated (t), that though an agent exceed the price named in his instructions, yet if, by means of doing so, he effect a saving on the same goods equal in amount to the excess of price, equity at least would consider him as justified. But it may be doubted whether this is correct where the agent had substantially exceeded his authority.

Rights of principal against agent.

An agent employed to purchase goods which are to be shipped abroad, ought to transmit the bill of lading to his employer as soon as possible (u).

In conclusion of this head, we must observe that there is a difference between the principal's rights against a remunerated and against an unremunerated agent. The former having once engaged, may be compelled to proceed to the task which he has undertaken; the latter cannot, for his promise to do so being induced by no consideration, the rule ex nudo pacto non oritur actio applies (x). But if he do commence his task, and afterwards be guilty of misconduct in performing it, he will, though unremunerated, be liable for the damage so occasioned; since, it is said, by entering upon the business he has prevented the employment of some better qualified person, and the detriment thus occasioned to his principal is a sufficient consideration to uphold an undertaking on his part to act with care and fidelity (y). Less skill, however, is required from him than from a paid agent. He is bound to use such skill as he possesses (z), but he is bound to that only; and it is sometimes said that for gross negligence alone can he be held answerable (a); unless he act in a public or professional character, in which case he holds himself out as possessing, and will be assumed to possess, skill, his omission to use which constitutes gross negligence (b).

The principal has, in most cases, no remedy against the sub-agent, there being no privity between them (c). But if the sub-agent had been party to a breach of trust, the rule of equity applies, viz., that all parties to a breach of trust are equally liable (d). In De Bussche v. Alt (e), it was laid down by Thesiger, L. J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, that > when an agent employs, in pursuance of authority, a sub-agent,—"privity of contract arises between the principal and the substitute, and the latter becomes as responsible to the former for the due discharge of the duties which his employment casts upon him as if he had been appointed agent by the principal himself" (e).

Embezzlements and fraudulent conversions of their employer's property committed by agents in breach of the confidence reposed in them, are punished criminally by stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 67, 68, 75—79.

Section III.—Rights of Agent against Principal.

Rights of agent against principal.

The chief right of the agent is to receive his remuneration, or, as it is often called, commission; the amount of which is could see no difference between negligence and gross negligence; that gross negligence was only negligence with a vituperative epithet. See Grill v. General I. S. C. Co., L. R. 1 C. fixed either by contract between him and his employer, or by the usage of trade in like cases (f), or, in some few instances, by Act of Parliament (g), or, if there be no usage, contract, or enactment applicable to the case, the value of his services must be determined by a judge or jury. Thus, a custom by which shipbrokers are entitled to a commission of five per cent. upon the freight payable upon charter parties obtained by them, has been proved (h). By the 30 Vict. c. 23, s. 16, insurance brokers are not entitled to the commission unless the policy is duly stamped.

Rights of agent against principal.

Whether in the case of an agent for sale commission be due only upon sale or independently of it, turns upon the terms of the contract or the custom of the trade (i). When agents are employed to sell or let, the rule is that they are entitled to commissions when they have brought about the relation of seller and buyer or lessor and lessee; commission is due though the actual sale or lease is not effected by them. In some cases a doubt has arisen, whether, on the special framing of the contract, the agent or servant is left to his employer's mercy in respect of his remuneration (k). When there is a special contract, and the precise event provided for has not happened, the agent may not be able to recover on a quantum meruit (l). The employer may revoke the employment or authority (m) to sell without paying anything to the agent. But as a rule he may not do so without indemnifying the agent for labour and expense in the course of the agency.

The agent may be deprived of his commission in several ways. If the object of his employment be illegal, he can of course claim none (n). He may also forfeit it by misconduct, as by bad faith (o); or neglect to keep an account, that being an essential part of his employment (p); or if gross negligence or want of skill on his part prevents his employer from deriving any benefit from his services (q); à fortiori, if he betray his trust and act adversely to his principal (r).

As the usage of trade may regulate the amount of his commission, so it may, under certain circumstances, deprive him entirely thereof. Thus, it would seem that a shipbroker can charge a shipowner nothing for his labour in procuring a charterer for the ship, unless the owner think proper to conclude a charter-party with him (s). In some cases, by the custom of merchants, only one-half commission is earned and due when the business is taken out of the hands of the agent (t). In these cases the usage is looked on as incorporated into the contract of agency. We have seen that, in ordinary cases, the agent, if he act with competent discretion and fidelity, and without deviating from the regular course of business, will not be answerable for any loss that may occur to his employer's property, and will, notwithstanding such loss, be entitled to his commission.

Rights of agent against principal.

Besides commission, he has a right to charge his principal with all advances made by him in the regular course of his employment; in the regular course, for such advances the principal, who deputed him in a business where they are necessary, has impliedly requested him to make (u). Such, for example, are differences paid by the broker employed to purchase shares on the Stock Exchange, and entitled by the usage of the market to sell if the purchaser does not pay within a certain time, and to charge him with the differences (x). Such, too, are charges for duties, warehousing, and porterage. As to charges for duties, it has been said, that if an agent at his own risk evade the payment of the foreign customs, he may charge them to his principal as paid (y); but not so of home customs, for that would be a fraud upon the king (z). However, the former part of this proposition has been questioned (a), and appears hardly sustainable. The principal's request may be inferred, where the advances are made in the regular course of trade, or even on the spur of some pressing exigency not provided for by an ordinary rule, since the employer may fairly be taken to have authorized the employed to do, under any circumstances, that which a prudent man would conceive necessary for the safeguard of his interests, ex. gr., to insure a cargo, which is in extraordinary danger on account of the lateness of the season (b). But if an agent think fit to make a payment out of the regular course of business, he will not, unless he can show circumstances from which his principal's authority may be inferred, or his principal adopts it (c), be entitled to repayment (d).

Moreover, though he is entitled to be repaid his regular expenses, yet if he conduct himself so negligently in his employment, as to incur expenses which would not have been necessary had he acted rightly, he will be allowed nothing on account of them (e).

A broker who has been employed to buy or sell shares on the Stock Exchange will be entitled to be indemnified in respect of payments which he has made in accordance with the rules or usages of the Stock Exchange (f). He may recover his commission in respect of transactions which as against the principal are void (g). A broker may recover differences, though the bargains are of the nature of gaming and wagering transactions.

"What the [broker] was employed to do was to buy and sell on the Stock Exchange, and this he did; and everything he did was perfectly legal, unless it was rendered illegal as between the defendant and himself by reason of the illegality of the object they had in view, or of the transactions in which they were engaged. Now, if gaming and wagering were illegal, I should be of opinion that the illegality of the transactions in which the plaintiff and defendant were engaged would have tainted, as between themselves, whatever the plaintiff had done in furtherance of their illegal design, and would have precluded him from claiming in a Court of law any indemnity in respect of the liabilities he had incurred: Cannan v. Bryce (h); McKinnell v. Robinson (i); Lyne v. Siesfield (k). Rights of agent against principal.

In Seymour v. Bridge (m), the Courts went still further. By Leeman's Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 29), a contract for the sale of bank shares which does not specify their numbers is void, and it is a misdemeanour on the part of the broker to make such contract. Nevertheless, Mathew, J., held the broker entitled to recover money paid on the Stock Exchange, it being proved that it was usual to disregard the Act, and that the principal knew of this usage. The Court of Appeal, however, has decided that the principal is not bound by such a usage if he be not aware of it (n); and in the absence of knowledge, such rules are not binding if they are unreasonable and at variance with the nature of the transaction (o). In the event of the person who employs a broker not paying for stock purchased, or becoming insolvent, the latter may close his principal's account and sell.

An agent is entitled to indemnity when, acting in obedience to the lawful orders of his principal (p), or when, in conformity to that principal's instructions, he does an act which may be either right or wrong, but which he is induced to believe right by the conduct of his employer; for, though there can be no indemnity between wrongdoers, that rule applies only where the party who seeks for the indemnity must have been conscious that in committing the act, against the consequences of which he asks to be indemnified, he was a wrongdoer (q).

Rights of third persons against principal.

As far as the agent's authority extends, he has a right to bind his principal to third persons. Now his authority may, as we have seen, be either expressly given or inferred from the acts of his supposed principal. When it is expressly given there can be no doubt as to its extent, except from the uncertainty of words employed in delegating it (r), or as to the implied powers intended to accompany those expressly given (s). When, however, it is to be inferred from the conduct of the principal, that conduct furnishes the only evidence of its extent as well as of its existence; and, in solving all questions on this subject, the general rule is, that the extent of the agent's authority is (as between his principal and third parties) to be measured by the extent of his usual employment; for he who accredits another by employing him, must abide by the effects of that credit, and will be bound by contracts made with innocent third persons in the seeming course of that employment, and on the faith of that credit, whether the employer intended to authorise them or not (t). Since, where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the fraud of a third, he who enabled that third person to commit the fraud should be the sufferer (u). On this principle it is, as we have seen in the first chapter, that one partner can bind another to contracts within the scope of the partnership business. The same principle is well illustrated by Holt, C. J. (x), who says, "If a man send his servant with ready money to buy goods, and the servant buy upon credit, the master is not chargeable. But if the servant usually buy for the master upon tick, and the servant buy some things without the master's order, yet, if the master were trusted by the trader, the master is chargeable." The same principle is applied to cases respecting notes or bills, which, if drawn, endorsed, or accepted by a clerk who has been previously allowed to do so, bind the master, though the money never come to his use (y). It is applied to sales (z), guarantees (a), and insurances (b); in a word, to every species of mercantile transaction, and whether the agent have or have not been dismissed from his employer's service, provided that the third party had no reason to be aware of the determination of his employment (c). Nor can the principal relieve himself by agreeing with his agent that the latter shall take the liability on his own shoulders, for strangers not cognizant of such an agreement are not bound by it (d).

The nature of the authority to be inferred, and the sufficiency of the principal's acts to raise the inference, must of course depend on the special circumstances of each case, and generally involve questions fit for the consideration of a jury (e). There is one instance in which the recognition of a single purchase made by his servant upon credit was held to bind the principal to a succeeding one (f). However, as the employment is the measure of the authority to be inferred, if there were no previous employment, there can of course be no inference of authority. In such a case, the party who trusts a servant does it at his peril, since the master will only be liable for what comes to his use; and not even for that, if he gave his servant money to pay for it (g).

As the employment is the measure of the authority, an employment in one line of business affords no inference of authority to act in another (h); and the authority must be inferred from facts which have occurred during the course of such employment, not from mere argument as to the utility or propriety of the agent's possessing it (i). Thus, though a clerk or apprentice may have an implied authority to receive money for his master in the course of business, that will give him no authority to receive it in collateral transactions (k), or out of the ordinary course of business (l). And thus, also, though a master of a ship, in case of necessity, when the owner is not present and cannot be communicated with, or he has not in the port any agent (m), has an implied authority to borrow money for the purposes of the ship, and may therefore bind his owner by contracting a loan for those purposes, yet if he borrow money on his own account, and afterwards apply it to the purposes of the ship, that is no exercise of his authority, and his master is not bound to repay that money (n).

It follows from the above observations that an agent may be tied down by very strict directions as between himself and principal, whom he may, notwithstanding, have power to bind by contracts, unauthorised by, and even in defiance of, them (o). Cases of this sort occur when a general agent, as he is called, exceeds his instructions. A general agent is a person whom a man puts in his place to transact all his business of a particular kind (p). Thus, a man usually retains a factor to buy and sell all goods, and a broker to negotiate all contracts of a certain description, a solicitor to transact all his legal business, a master to perform all things relating to the usual employment of his ship (r), and so in other instances. This distinction was illustrated in the case of Drew v. Nunn (s). The defendant had held out his wife as his agent, and as entitled to pledge his credit. The defendant became insane; while he was in that condition his wife ordered goods from the plaintiff, who supplied them without knowledge of the defendant's insanity. On recovering his reason, the plaintiff refused to pay for the goods. He was held liable, on the ground that he could not withdraw his authority as to third persons without giving them notice.

Rights of third persons against principal.

The authority of an agent to perform all things usual (t) in the line of business in which he is employed, cannot be limited by any private order or direction not known to the party dealing with him (u).

"Where an agent," says Lord Blackburn, "is clothed with ostensible authority, no private instructions prevent his acts within the scope of that authority from binding his principal. Where his authority depends, and is known to those who deal with the agent to depend, on a written mandate, it may be necessary to produce or account for the non-production of that writing, in order to prove what was the scope of the agent's authority" (x).

It would probably be accurate to say that a general agent is one generally or usually employed to do certain things, few or many; while a special agent is only specifically authorised to act in regard to certain matters, whether many or few.

(r) The authority of a master is very extensive: see Ringuist v. Ditchell, Abb. 12th ed. p. 88; 3 Esp. 64; Ellis v. Turner, 8 T. The rule is directly the reverse concerning a particular agent, i.e., an agent employed specially in one single transaction; for it is the duty of the party dealing with such a one to ascertain the extent of his authority; and if he do not he must abide the consequences (y).

We have seen that a subsequent assent by the principal to his agent's conduct exonerates the latter from the consequences of a departure from his orders. In like manner, it will render the principal liable for contracts made in violation of such orders, or even without any previous retainer or employment, for omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur et mandato æquiparatur (z). Such an assent may be inferred from the conduct of the principal (a), who cannot confirm a transaction in part and repudiate it as to the rest, but must either adopt all or none (b).

The general rule is, that the authority, of whatever description, must be strictly observed, otherwise the principal, if his agent be a particular one, will not be bound. And if he be a general agent, will not be bound, save under the circumstances above described; and not under any circumstances whatever, if the third party, at the time of his contracting was, or ought to have been, aware of the limited extent of the agent's authority, which was formerly construed by the Courts with a great deal of strictness (c). Thus, if given to two, it cannot be executed by one, though the other should die or refuse; and if given to three jointly and severally, it cannot be executed by two, though it may either by all three or by one only (d). This rule does not apply to public agencies; and even in regard to agencies of a private nature, the Courts are now disposed to relax from the technical precision of ancient times in construing these and the like words, and will search the whole instrument for the maker's intention (e). But where that is once ascertained, they will confine the agent to it with the utmost strictness (f).

Rights of third persons against principal.

At the same time, the Courts are so far liberal in construing authorities given to agents, that they will hold them to include permission to use all necessary, or even usual, means of carrying the main intention of the principal into effect in the best manner (g). Thus, an agent employed to get a bill discounted may, perhaps, unless expressly restricted, endorse it in the name of his employer (h). A broker employed to effect a policy of insurance may adjust the loss, and do all that is requisite towards such adjustment (i): an agent to receive rents and let, has power to determine the tenancy (k): an agent employed to issue process may receive the debt and costs (l):

an agent entrusted with the possession of goods for the purpose of selling, is authorised to sell them in his own name (m): and, it is said, a warranty given by an agent entrusted to sell primâ facie binds the principal (n). A master who sends his servant to buy goods, and gives him no money to pay, doubtless authorises him to pledge his credit (o). On the other hand, an authority to "negotiate, make sale, dispose of, assign and transfer" securities, does not imply authority to pledge (p). Nor does authority to pay, receive, or to draw cheques import authority to endorse (q). But evidence of such authority to draw is not to be withheld from the jury, who are to determine whether such authority to endorse exists or not, and who may justly be satisfied with less evidence thereof when it is proved that the clerk is a confidential clerk, and has undisputed authority to draw in the name of his principal (r). If the agent indorses by procuration, the principal is only bound if the agent was acting within the actual limits of his authority (s).

Though the agent has an implied authority to use those means of which the principal could not but have foreseen the necessity, and, therefore, could not but have intended to authorise, yet if an unusual contingency arise, it does not follow that the agent will have power, however useful it might be, to do that which would enable him to meet the contingency in the best manner. Thus, it was decided in Hawtayne v. Bourne (t), that there is no implied authority in an agent conducting the general business of a mine to borrow money in case of necessity.

The Court of Session held that, in the absence of an express power of borrowing, the principals were not chargeable. The Court did not advert to the fact that the agent signed "per pro."

Rights of third persons against principal.

"No such power," said Parke, B., "exists, except in the cases of the master of a ship, and of the acceptor of a bill of exchange for the honour of the drawer (u). The latter derives its existence from the law of merchants, and in the former case, the law, which generally provides for ordinary events, and not for cases which are of rare occurrence, considers how likely and frequent are accidents at sea, when it may be necessary, in order to have the vessel repaired, or to provide the means of continuing the voyage, to pledge the credit of her owners; and therefore it is that the law invests the master with power to raise money, and, by an instrument of hypothecation, to pledge the ship itself, if necessary. If that case be analogous to this, it follows that the agent had power, not only to borrow money, but, in the event of security being required, to mortgage the mine itself. The authority of the master of a ship rests upon the peculiar character of his office, and affords no analogy to the case of an ordinary agent. I am therefore of opinion that the agent of this mine had not the authority contended for."

Such being the general rules concerning an agent's power, let us now consider, a little more particularly, what course he must pursue, in order to bind his principal by two or three of the most usual species of engagements.

In executing a deed, he may either sign the name of his principal (x), or state it to be done by himself as agent for his principal (y), or by his principal through him the agent (z). But if he sign his own name without mentioning his principal, the latter will not be bound (a). In like manner an agent employed to draw, endorse or accept negotiable instruments, must take care not to do so in his own name, for if he do, he will himself be liable to the holder (b).

As to the agent's power to bind the principal by a disposition of his goods, the common law rule was, as may be collected from the foregoing observations, that to acquire a good title to the employer's property by purchasing it from his agent, such purchase must have been in market overt (c) and without knowledge of the seller's representative capacity, or from an agent acting according to his instructions, or from one acting in the usual course of his employment, and whom the buyer did not know to be transgressing his instructions (d). The reason of this is clear, unless the transaction take place bonâ fide in a market overt (in which case a peculiar rule of law steps in for its protection (e)), an agent selling without express authority must, that his act might be supported, have sold under an implied one. But we have seen that an implied authority always empowers the person authorised to act in the usual course of his employment. Consequently, if he sell in an unusual mode, he can have no implied authority to support his act; and as he has no express one, his sale of course falls to the ground. For instance, the usual employment of a factor being to sell, it has been repeatedly decided that he cannot pledge the goods entrusted to him (f); and at common law this was the case whether he was intrusted with the goods or the documents of title (g).

Rights of third persons against principal.

Such was the rule of the common law; but, being considered prejudicial to credit by the greater number of mercantile men, it was altered by 4 Geo. 4, c. 83, and afterwards by the amending Acts, 6 Geo. 4, c. 94, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39, and 40 & 41 Vict. c. 39 (h). These statutes have been repealed, and the present law is contained in the Factors Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 45). This Act deals with three subjects—"(a) dispositions (i) by mercantile agents," "(b) advances by consignees and their liens," and "(c) dispositions by sellers and buyers of goods."

"Mercantile agent" (k) is thus defined:

"The expression mercantile agent shall mean a mercantile agent having, in the customary course of his business as such agent, authority either to sell goods, or to consign goods for the purpose of sale, or to buy goods, or to raise money on the security of goods."

This is in accordance with the definition of "agent" and "person" in the former Acts; but the new Act expressly includes a mercantile agent authorized "to raise money on the security of goods."

"Document of title" is defined as including "any bill of lading, dock warrant, warehouse keeper's certificate, and warrant or order for the delivery of goods, and any other document used in the ordinary course of business, as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorizing or purporting to authorize,

(h) Sect. 2 of 4 Geo. 4, c. 83, is still unrepealed.

P., Blackburn, J., says, at p. 368—"The Legislature meant by the word 'agent' only such agents as in the usual course of business sell goods for their principals and receive payments, such as factors, brokers (?), &c., and did not mean to include bailees, warehousemen, carriers, and others, who may in one sense no doubt be called agents, but who do not sell or receive payment for goods intrusted to them by those employing them." See Monk v. Whittenbury, 2 B. & Ad. 484 (wharfinger not an "agent"); Baines v. Swainson, 4 B. & S. 270; and Hollings v. Russell, 33 L. T. N. S. 380. The two last cases are with difficulty reconcilable.

either by indorsement or by delivery, the possessor of the document to transfer or receive goods thereby represented." This definition is borrowed from sect. 4 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39.

(a) Section 2 enacts,—

"(1.) Where a mercantile agent is, with the consent of the owner, in possession of goods or of the documents of title to goods, any sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods, made by him (k) when acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be as valid as if he were expressly authorized by the owner of the goods to make the same; provided that the person taking under the disposition acts in good faith, and has not at the time of the disposition notice (l) that the person making the disposition has not authority to make the same.

"(2.) Where a mercantile agent has, with the consent of the owner, been in possession of goods or of the documents of title to goods, any sale, pledge, or other disposition, which would have been valid if the consent had continued, shall be valid notwithstanding the determination of the consent: provided that the person taking under the disposition has not at the time thereof notice that the consent has been determined.

"(3.) Where a mercantile agent has obtained possession of any documents of title to goods by reason of his being or having been, with the consent of the owner, in possession of the goods represented thereby, or of any other documents of title to the goods, his possession of the first-mentioned documents shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be with the consent of the owner.

"(4.) For the purposes of this Act the consent of the owner shall be presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary."

Sub-section 2, which repeals the substance of 40 & 41 Vict. c. 39, s. 2, is intended to alter the law as laid down in Fuentes v. Montis (m), where an agent who had been entrusted with goods for sale, but who had been deprived of his authority by his principal, was held not to be intrusted within the meaning

To the power of the mercantile agent to sell or pledge, two qualifications, also derived from the former Acts, are appended. A pledgee to whom goods have been pledged as security for a debt or liability due before the time of the pledge (p), acquires no further right to the goods than could have been enforced by the pledgor at the time of the pledge (q); and if the consideration for the pledge is the delivery or transfer of other goods, documents of title, or negotiable securities, the pledgee acquires no right or interest in the goods pledged in excess of the value of the goods, documents or securities delivered or transferred (qq).

(b) Section 7 (1), protects advances by consignees to consignors, provided the consignee has not had notice that the latter is not the owner, and enables the consignee to transfer his lien (r).

(c) Sections 8, 9, and 10, which re-enact sections, 3, 4, and 5 of the Factors Act, 1877, relate to dispositions by sellers and buyers of goods.

Section 8 alters the law as laid down in Johnson v. Crédit Lyonnais (s). A merchant and broker sold to the plaintiff tobacco, which was in bond in the warehouses of St. Katharine's Dock Company. The merchant had received the dock warrant, and was entered as owner in the company's books. The plaintiff, not then wishing possession of the tobacco, left it in the merchant's name, and the dock warrants in his hands. The merchant fraudulently pledged the documents with the defendants. The defendants were not, it was held, protected by the Factors Acts; the merchant not being an agent entrusted with documents of title.

Section 8 enacts—

"Where a person, having sold goods, continues, or is, in possession of the goods or of the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer by that person, or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, or under any agreement for sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of the previous sale, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were expressly authorized by the owner of the goods to make the same."

It was decided, in Jenkyns v. Usborne (g), and in Van Casteel v. Booker (h), that a purchaser, obtaining possession of documents of title to goods, was not an "agent entrusted" within the meaning of the Factors Act. By section 9, which reproduces section 4 of the Factors Act, 1877, it is enacted,—

"Where a person, having bought or agreed to buy goods, obtains with the consent of the seller possession of the goods or the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer, by that person or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title, under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, or under any agreement for sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller in respect of the goods, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods or documents of title with the consent of the owner."

Section 10 professes to extend to all documents of title the effect which the transfer of a bill of lading has in defeating the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, but it is not clear what cases, other than those included in section 9, it includes.

When an agent, having a proper authority, purchases or sells in the name of his principal, it is clear, from what has been said that the principal is bound to the vendor or purchaser. If, however, the vendor, preferring the credit of the agent to that of the principal, agree with the former to accept him as his debtor instead of the latter, he cannot afterwards alter his election, and turn round and charge the principal (i). But it often happens that a broker purchases in his own name, without disclosing that he has any principal. Where this takes place, the broker is, of course, the person to whom the vendor gives credit; yet, if he afterwards discover the principal, he may elect to abandon the responsibility of his broker, and charge him (k); and so he may if the broker, on making the purchase, stated himself to be an agent, but omitted to state the name of the principal, which is afterwards discovered (l), or if the broker purchases in his own name, but discloses the name of his principal (m).

The liability of the undisclosed principal is subject, however, to a qualification, the rule as to which, as laid down by Bayley, J., in Thompson v. Davenport (n), was, that if the principal has paid the agent, or if the state of the accounts between the agent and the principal would make it unjust that the seller should call on the principal, the fact of payment, or such a state of accounts, would be an answer to the action by the seller, where he had looked to the responsibility of the agent. In Heald v. Kenworthy (o) this rule was somewhat narrowed, and was thus expressed by Parke, B.:—

"If the conduct of the seller would make it unjust for him to call upon the buyer for the money; as, for example, where the principal is induced by the conduct of the seller to pay his agent the money, on the faith that the agent and seller have come to a settlement on the matter, or if any representation to that effect is made

(k) Railton v. Hodgeon, 4 Taunt. 576, n.; Wilson v. Hart, 7 Taunt. 295. The law of evidence opposes no obstacle to the exercise of this election, even where the contract is in writing; for if the principal allow the agent to contract for him in his (the agent's) name, the name becomes for the purposes of the contract his own: Trueman v. Loder, 11 A. & E. 589, at p. 594; Calder v. Dobell, L. by the seller, either by words or conduct, the seller cannot afterwards throw off the mask and sue the principal."

In Irvine v. Watson (q)—a case of a person knowing that he was dealing with an agent, but not knowing the principal's name—Bowen, J., thus stated the law:—

"It surely must, at all events, be the law that in the case of sale of goods to a broker, the principal, known or unknown, cannot, by paying or settling before the time of payment comes with his own agent, relieve himself from responsibility to the seller, except in the one case where exclusive credit was given by the seller to the agent. But may the payment or settlement to or with the agent be safely made in such a case after the day of payment has arrived, and, if so, within what time? It seems to me that it can only safely be made if a delay has intervened which may reasonably lead the principal to infer that the seller no longer requires to look to the principal's credit, such a delay, for example, as leads to the inference that the debt is paid by the agent, or to the inference that, though the debt is not paid, the seller elects to abandon his recourse to the principal and to look to the agent alone."

The judgment of Bowen, J., was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (Bramwell, L.J., Baggallay, L.J., and Brett, L.J.), who approved and adopted the statement of the law by Parke, B., in Heald v. Kenworthy (r). And the same view was adopted in Davison v. Donaldson (s).

In the recent case of Cooke v. Eshelby (t), it was held by the House of Lords that the purchaser of cotton sold to him by agents in their own names, but in fact on behalf of an undisclosed principal (the purchaser knowing that the agents were in the habit of selling both for principals and on their own account, but having no belief as to whether the sale in question was on their own account or for principals), could not, in an action by the undisclosed principal for the price, set off a debt due to him by the agents. According to Lord Watson (u),— or, in other words, that the circumstances attending the sale were calculated to induce, and did induce, in the mind of the purchaser a reasonable belief that the agent was selling on his own account, and not for an undisclosed principal; and it must also be shown that the agent was enabled to appear as the real contracting party by the conduct, or by the authority, express or implied, of the principal. The rule thus explained is intelligible and just; and I agree with Bowen, L. J., that it rests upon the doctrine of estoppel."

Accordingly, payment to an agent, known to be such, will not discharge the payer, unless the conduct of the principal induces him to pay the agent. Where the seller supposes that he is dealing with a principal, when, in fact, he is dealing with an agent, the case of Armstrong v. Stokes (x) seems to be an authority that payment to the agent will discharge the principal; but it is open to question whether that case is reconcilable with the ratio decidendi in the later case of Irvine v. Watson (y). The decision in Armstrong v. Stokes must be taken to have turned upon the very special circumstances there.

If the time for payment have not elapsed, the other contracting party cannot, by prematurely settling with the agent, deprive the undisclosed principal of his election (z).

It has been laid down also, as a rule, that whenever on a sale made here, the agent is an English and the principal a foreign merchant, the seller will be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to have given credit to the Englishman, and that he and not the foreigner is liable (a). So, likewise, in the case of an English merchant employing an agent to buy goods abroad, primâ facie he gives the agent no authority to pledge his credit (b). But the rule would not apply to the case of a foreign merchant sending goods to an English agent, not to be sold by him, but to forward them to be sold by others. Such was the substance of the facts in Mildred v. Maspons (c), where the foreign merchant was permitted to recover policy moneys from the defendant English merchants, who had effected an insurance on the ship for the benefit of all interested.

Though the foregoing observations chiefly refer to contracts, the principal will be equally bound by any act done by the agent in the course of his employment and with reference to the object of it; for a man cannot depute another to transact his business and refuse to be responsible for his conduct in transacting it. Therefore, the representation of the agent about the subject-matter of a contract, which he is negotiating for his principal, will, if made during the course of that negotiation, bind the latter (d); but it must be made during, and in the course of, the negotiation, while the agent is actually representing his principal therein; for if made at any other time it has no more effect than that of a mere stranger (e). So, also, the suppression or misrepresentation by an agent of a material fact vitiates an insurance, although that fact may have been known only to him, not to his principal (f); for notice to the agent (g) is considered in law notice to the principal, who is in general taken to know everything about a transaction that his agent in it knows (h); vice versâ notice to the principal is, where that becomes material, generally speaking (i), at least, notice to the agent (k).

Rights of third persons against principal.

"Some agents so far represent the principal that in all respects their acts and intentions and their knowledge may truly be said to be the acts, intentions, and knowledge of the principal. Other agents may have so limited and narrow an authority, both in fact and in the common understanding of their form of employment, that it would be quite inaccurate to say that such an agent's knowledge or intentions are the knowledge or intentions of his principal, &c. . . . Where the employment of the agent is such that in respect of the particular matter in question he really does represent the principal, the formula that the knowledge of the agent is his knowledge, is, I think, correct; but it is obvious that formula can only be applied when the words 'agent' and 'principal' are limited in their application" (l).

As the agent's representation binds the principal, so is the former's admission of a fact evidence against the latter of its truth (m). But the admission must, like the representation, concern a matter in which the agent is employed to act for his principal, and must be made during and in the course of such employment (n). To use the words of Gibbs, J., in Langhorn v. Allnutt (n),—

"When it is proved that A. is agent for B., whatever A. does, or says, or writes, in the making of a contract as agent of B., is admissible in evidence, because it is part of the contract which he makes for B., and therefore binds B.; but it is not admissible as his account of what passes."

An admission in writing of a debt, signed by an agent, will now take it out of the Statute of Limitations as against his principal (o). But the signature of an agent is not a signature within the meaning of 9 Geo. 4, c. 14 (Lord Tenterden's Act), so as to make the principal liable for representations as to the credit of another person (p).

Rights of third persons against principal.

Payment, or tender of payment, to an agent in the course of his employment, is payment, or tender of payment, to the principal (q). But the payment must be in the course of his employment (r); for otherwise he will have no express authority, and there will be nothing whence to deduce the existence of an implied one. Therefore, if a man comes to pay a mortgage debt to a merchant at his counting house, and pays it to a clerk, or if an executor pays a legacy left to a tradesman to a shopman serving in his shop, who has been in the habit of receiving his weekly bills, in neither of these cases would there be a good payment to the master (s). It is not in the course of a broker's business to receive payment for goods, the sale of which he has negotiated (t), unless he be acting for an undisclosed principal (u). An insurance broker has a right to receive payment of a loss (x); but he must not, in the absence of any evidence of consent to such a course on the part of the assured, set it off against his own debt to the underwriter (y); for "The general rule of law is, that if a creditor employs an agent to receive money of a debtor, and the agent receives it, the debtor is discharged as against the principal; but if the agent, instead of receiving money, writes off money due from him to the debtor, then the latter is not discharged" (z).

Rights of third persons against principal.

Where, however, the usual course of trade warrants the receipt of a cheque, note, or bill, payment in that way to an agent will discharge the debtor, unless, indeed, the agent be a particular one, and such a course be inconsistent with his instructions (a). Though the general rule is as has just been stated, it is held that—

"Where an insurance broker or other mercantile agent has been employed to receive money for another, in the general course of his business," it was said, in Stewart v. Aberdein, "and where the known general course of business is for the agent to keep a running account with the principal, and to credit him with the sums which he may have received, by credits in account with the debtors, with whom he also keeps running accounts, and not merely with moneys actually received, the above rule cannot properly be applied; but it must be understood, that where an account is bonâ fide settled, according to that known usage, the original debtor is discharged, and the agent becomes the debtor, according to the meaning and intention, and with the authority of the principal" (b).

In Sweeting v. Pearce (c) this usage was held not to be binding on a shipowner unaware of it; and it is not clear that Stewart v. Aberdein (b) was not decided upon the facts that the plaintiff knew and assented to the usage. Payment to an agent, moreover, in order to be good, must in general (d) be specifically appropriated to the debt due to his principal, and not made upon a general account (e).

A factor is, by the nature of his employment, authorized to receive payment for the goods of which he disposes (e), yet a payment even to him will not exonerate a debtor who has received express notice from the creditor not to pay his factor (f). However, if the creditor be indebted on the balance of account to the factor, the debtor will be exonerated by a payment to the latter; for a factor has, as we shall see in the Fourth Book, a lien for the general balance of his account upon the price of goods which he has sold (g).

When money is due upon a written security, such as a bill or bond, it is the duty of the debtor, if he pay to an agent, to see that such agent is in possession of the security, for otherwise it is said that he will not be discharged unless the money reach the principal, or unless he can prove that the agent really was deputed to receive that money: not even, it is said, though the agent to whom he pays may have been usually employed to receive money (h), for his non-production of the security rebuts the implication of authority arising from such his employment. But this is open to great doubt; though circumstances might be held by a jury to be proof of knowledge of the absence of authority.

As payment to an authorized agent is payment to his principal, so a delivery to the former is a delivery to the latter. Thus, a delivery of goods to a carrier's servant is a delivery of them to the carrier (i). All these instances, and many others, only exemplify the general maxim upon which the whole law of principal and agent hinges: Qui facit per alium facit per se.

Hitherto we have only considered the responsibility of the principal to third parties, in consequence of contracts, and acts connected with such contracts; but he is also liable, and that to a considerable extent, for wrongs committed by his agent while engaged in his service. He will, of course, be so in every instance in which he has expressly commanded the wrong to be done, or given orders which could be executed only by its commission (k); and there are many instances in which it requires no express command to make him answerable.

Thus he is responsible for the negligence of his agent, acting in the prosecution of his business (l), though not under his immediate direction. The most common instance is the liability of a master for the negligence of his servants, that is, for this purpose, persons bound to obey his orders as to the mode of doing work (m). This liability does not extend to the negligence of agents, sub-agents, contractors or sub-contractors, who are free to carry out work in what manner they think fit without being controlled by the employer. It does not extend to such a case as this: the defendant hired job horses and coachmen from a livery stable-keeper to drive the defendant's carriage, and the coachman, appointed and paid by the stable-keeper, negligently drove the carriage against the plaintiff's horse (n). Nor is the employer answerable for the acts of those whom he is bound by statute to employ, e.g., pilots (o). Nor, before the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), was the master generally answerable to a servant for the negligence of a fellow servant. It was assumed that a servant undertook to accept, as one of the risks of his employment, the negligence of a fellow servant (p). The Act has materially altered the common law, and, "with certain exceptions, has placed the workman in a position as advantageous as, but no better than, that of the rest of the world, who use the master's premises at his invitation on business" (r). Though a master is answerable for the negligence of his agents while acting in his service, he is not so liable for wilful or malicious trespasses for their private ends. Thus, "if a servant driving a carriage, in order to effect some purpose of his own, wantonly strike the horses of another person and produce the accident, the master is not liable. But if, in order to perform his master's orders, he strikes, but injudiciously, and in order to extricate himself from a difficulty, that will be negligent and careless conduct for which the master will be liable, being an act done in pursuance of the servant's employment" (s). The master, however, will be liable for an injury committed by his servant at the time acting in his master's service and for his benefit, though the latter has acted wilfully or maliciously (t).

The principal may be liable not only for the negligence, but the fraud of the agent. Notwithstanding the reluctance of many judges to accept this view, it is now settled that, in the language of Willes, J., in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank (u), "with respect to the question, whether a principal is answerable for the act of his agent in the course of his master's business and for his master's benefit, no sensible distinction can be drawn between the case of fraud and the case of any other wrong." The Court of Appeal has, in British Mutual Banking Co. v. Charnwood Forest Ry. Co. (x), drawn attention to an important qualification of a principal's liability for frauds or similar torts. A secretary of a company gave untrue and fraudulent answers to questions put to him; the jury found that he was employed by the defendant to answer such inquiries. Nevertheless, the fraud having been committed in his own interest and for his own benefit, the company were not liable (y).

In general the principal is not criminally responsible for the act of his agent, unless he expressly commanded it (z). However, in a case of indictment for a nuisance, it was held that the owner of the works who carried them on by means of his agents was liable for their acts in conducting them, though done contrary to his orders (a). So upon an indictment for libel, the person who derived profit from, and furnished the funds for, carrying on a newspaper, intrusting the publication to one in whom he confided, would, at common law, be criminally answerable for what appeared therein, though it could not be shown that he was concerned in the individual publication (b). In informations for breaches of the revenue laws, the employment of an agent in the defendant's usual course of business has been held sufficient evidence to be left to a jury, who may, if they think fit, thence presume that such an agent was authorized to do the prohibited act, with which it is sought to charge his principal (c).

Rights of third persons against principal.

Our last inquiry under this head is, how the agent's power to commit his principal to third parties may be determined. It will be so, of course, by the revocation of his authority. The general rule is, that a principal may revoke the authority of his agent at any time unless there is a contract, express or implied, to the contrary (d). In Rhodes v. Forwood (e), the chief facts were these: A. and B. agreed, in consideration of services and payments to be mutually rendered, that for seven years, or as long as A. should carry on business in Liverpool, A. should be the sole agent there for the sale of B.'s coals. At the end of four years B. sold his colliery and ceased to send coals to Liverpool or to employ A. In an action by A. against B. the House of Lords laid it down that there was no implied understanding that B. would keep the colliery or do more than employ the agent in the event of his sending coals to Liverpool. Nor will the circumstance that an agent has made advances to his principal of itself make the agency irrevocable (f); there must be an agreement to that effect. But an agency will not be revocable at will if the authority has been partly executed and cannot be withdrawn without injuring the agent (g). One decision, Read v. Anderson (h), appears to go further than any former case. The plaintiff, a turf commission agent, was instructed to make bets for the defendant at Tattersall's. After the bets had been made and lost, the defendant revoked his authority. The plaintiff brought an action to recover the amount of three bets which he had made for the defendant and paid. Had the plaintiff not paid the bets, he would, it was proved, have been a defaulter within the meaning of Tattersall's rules, and would have been liable to have been turned out of the room. Brett, M. R., held that the action would not lie on the ground that no claim could have been enforced in law by the winners against the agent. Bowen, L. J., and Fry, L. J., however, held that the action would lie.

"As an inference of fact," said the former, "it seems to me that it was well understood to be part of the bargain that the principal should recoup his agent, and should not revoke the authority to pay, but should indemnify the agent against all payments made in the regular course of business. I feel the force of the point that the obligation to pay a lost bet relied upon by the plaintiff is not recognised by law; but the plaintiff has placed himself in a position of pecuniary difficulty at the defendant's request, who impliedly contracted, I think, to indemnify him from the consequences which would ensue in the ordinary course of his business from the step which he had taken."

security to a creditor, is not revocable (i). Authority may be terminated by the agent's own renunciation of it, at all events if accepted by his principal (k).

Rights of third persons against principal.

It was formerly held that agency was revoked by the marriage of the principal, if a feme sole (l); but this appears to be no longer true. Agency will in general expire by operation of law when the capacity of the principal ends. Thus, it will be revoked by the death of the principal (m), and that even though coupled with an interest; "for how," says Lord Ellenborough, "can a valid act be done in the name of a dead man?" (n) or by his bankruptcy (o), except in certain cases in which the interest of the creditors cannot be affected, and the power is one which in conscience ought to be exercised, as where the vendor of a ship at sea executed a power to indorse the transfer on her certificate, and then became bankrupt, the power was held not revoked by the bankruptcy (p). The effect of insanity upon the relation of principal and agent seems not yet well settled (q). It seems clear that as soon as the principal's lunacy comes to

The authority of a stakeholder, with whom is deposited a bet, is countermandable: Trimble v. Hill, 5 App. Cas. 542; Diggle v. Higgs, 2 Ex. D. 422.

(k) Generally speaking, a power cannot be released unless coupled with an interest in the party possessing it: Trippet v. Eyre, 2 Vent. 110; Digge's case, Moore, 603, pl. 835. But this case does not seem applicable to the case of a mercantile agent, for he may be said to have an interest in the remuneration he is entitled to; and, besides, his power being in its nature revocable by the principal, whom it would be unfair in many cases to treat as free while the agent was bound, probably it may be considered that the creation of a mercantile agency contains an implied term, that it shall be revocable at the will of either, if the contrary do not appear. the knowledge of the agent his authority ends: what forms or degrees of insanity will operate of themselves as a revocation is not clear.

The implied authority arising from previous employment can, as we have seen, be determined only by rendering it notorious to the world in general, or to the particular person who relies on it, that such employment has been put an end to (g). Si Titium omnibus negotiis meis præposuero, deinde vetuero eum, ignorantibus debitoribus, administrare negotia mea, debitores ei solvendo liberabuntur. And if a particular agent were to contract after the revocation of his authority, but before the revocation had been made known to him, persons who had dealt upon the faith of it would not be permitted to suffer (h); excepting, indeed, in the case of a revocation by death, in which it seems, from Blades v. Free (i), that the representatives of the deceased principal would not be liable, and from Smout v. Ilbery (k), that the agent, if he had made no representation on the subject, would not be so. It would seem also just, on principle, that an agent should not be prejudiced by the revocation of his power, without his own knowledge (l). Yet, though it would appear that an agent acting under a particular authority, after his master's bankruptcy, which was not known to him, will not be liable to the assignees, it has been held otherwise where his authority was a general one (m).

The rule of the civil law guarded against detriment either to the agent or to those contracting with him, by the sudden revocation of his authority. Nemo potest mutare consilium suum in alterius injuriam (n). Si mandassem tibi ut fundum emeres, postea scripsissem ne emeres, tu antequam scias me vetuisse emisses, mandati tibi obligatus ero, ne damno afficiatur is qui suscipit mandatum (o). Pothier goes further, and lays it down that an agent has, in such cases, a right "faire ce qui est une suite nécessaire de ce qu'il avoit commencé" (p). When an agent has completed his task, his authority of course determines. Thus, an auctioneer, when he has sold, is functus officio, and has no right to treat about the mode of making out a title (q). So where the prefixed time, during which the agency was to continue, expires (r). As to this point, each contract of agency must be considered by itself. Below will be found some of the cases in which the Courts have determined the question (s).

Section V.—Rights of the Principal against Third Parties.

As the principal is bound by the acts and contracts of his authorized agent, so he may take advantage of them (t); and if one person contract, even without authority, in the name of another, that other, though he may repudiate the contract, may, if he think fit, adopt and enforce it (u). But (1.) He must adopt it altogether: he cannot ratify what is beneficial to himself, and reject the remainder (x). (2.) The act to be ratified must not be void or ultra vires (y). (3.) ratification of an indictable offence or an act contrary to public policy. Thus it is not competent for a principal to ratify a forged indorsement to a bill of exchange (z). (4.) The principal must be ascertained or in contemplation at the time when the act to be ratified was performed (a). He must also be in existence (b). Hence a company cannot ratify a contract entered into by promoters or others before its formation, though it may, and often does, enter into a new contract which has an effect similar to that of ratification (c). (5.) The principal must be capable of making the contract which the agent has entered into. To this there is an exception in the case of marine insurance. An insurance of a vessel effected by a person who knew at the time of entering into the contract of the loss would be invalid. But the authorities show that when an insurance is effected without authority by one person on behalf of another, the principal may ratify it, even after the loss is known to him (d). (6.) The act must be performed by a person professing to be agent for the principal. Even if it be done professedly as an agent, but for the benefit of A., B.'s adoption of it would be inoperative (e). (7.) To bind the principal the ratification must be with knowledge of the material circumstances (f). (8.) Assent must be given to acts really done by the agent, and not to those which he is falsely represented to have done (g). (9.) An estate once vested cannot be divested; and an act lawful at the time of performance cannot be rendered unlawful by the application of the doctrine of ratification (h). (10.) There is a difference between the principal's right to adopt a contract, and a bare act, the effect of which would be to raise a duty towards him from a third party, and subject that third party to damage for its non-performance. Such an act can never, if unauthorized at first, be confirmed by any recognition ex post facto. Thus, a demand of payment, in order to oust the debtor's plea of tender, or a demand of property, in order to found an action of trover, must be made by an agent previously authorized (i); and the same doctrine applies to a notice to quit (j), notwithstanding the case of Roe v. Pierce (k), and Goodtitle v. Woodward (l) (which latter may be supported on another ground (m)). Where a previous authority is requisite, it seems that the person whom it is to affect may require to be properly satisfied of its existence, and is not bound to take the agent's bare assertion (n). In other instances, where no duty is to be raised on the part of a third person, an adoption ex post facto is generally sufficient (o).

If an agent acting for an undisclosed principal have made a contract in his own name, the principal may sue upon it (p), unless the contract is under seal (q), or unless the agent really contracts as principal, e.g., where he describes himself in a charter-party as "owner" (r). It follows, as a branch of this rule, that if a person lend money nominally on his own account, but really on account and as the loan of another, the real lender may sue for the money. But in such a case, the plaintiff who alleges that he was in reality the lender, must prove that fact clearly and distinctly (s).

Rights of the principal against third parties.

The principal's right to enforce contracts made by his agent is subject to this rule, viz., that if the agent have been allowed to deal in his own name, the party dealing with him will enjoy the same rights and equities against the employer as he might have exercised against his agent had that agent really been a principal (t). Thus, when a factor dealing for a principal, but concealing the existence of a principal, delivers goods in his own name, the person contracting with him has a right to consider him to all intents and purposes the principal; and, though the real principal may appear, and bring an action on that contract against the purchaser of the goods, yet that purchaser may set off any claim he may have against the factor, in answer to the demand of the principal. If the existence of a principal is not known, the person contracting with the agent will have the right of set-off, even if the agent in selling in his own name is contravening his instructions (u). This rule is to prevent the hardship under which a purchaser would labour if, after having been induced by peculiar considerations, such, for instance, as the consciousness of possessing a set-off, to deal with one man, he could be turned over and made liable to another, to whom those considerations would not apply, and with whom he would not willingly have contracted. But if, at any time in the course of the transaction, he know or have means of knowing that the person with whom he deals is not a principal, the above reason does not apply, and then cessante ratione cessat ipsa lex (v). Thus, if a factor sells goods in his own name, the buyer may avail himself of a right of set off against the factor;

if, however, a broker do so, the rule will, except under special circumstances, be different. For— Rights of the principal against third parties.

"A factor, who has the possession of goods, differs materially from a broker. The former is a person to whom goods are sent or consigned. When he sells in his own name, it is within the scope of his authority; and it may be right, therefore, that the principal should be bound by the consequences of such sale, amongst which the right of setting off a debt due from the factor is one (x). But the case of a broker is different; he has not the possession of the goods, and so the vendee cannot be deceived by that circumstance: and, besides, the employing of a person to sell goods as a broker does not authorize him to sell in his own name. If, therefore, he sells in his own name, he acts beyond the scope of his authority, and his principal will not be bound (y). But it is said that by these means the broker would be enabled by his principal to deceive innocent persons. The answer, however, is obvious: that that cannot be so, unless the principal delivers over to him the possession and indicia of property" (z).

To entitle the purchaser dealing with a broker to a set off, it must be shown that the circumstances connected with the sale were such as to make him reasonably believe that the broker was selling on his own account, and that the agent was enabled, by the conduct or authority, express or implied, of the undisclosed principal to appear as the seller (a).

We have seen that payment or delivery to an agent is payment or delivery to his principal. This holds good vice versâ (b); and therefore where the agent has paid away or delivered over his master's property on a consideration which fails, or otherwise under circumstances which would entitle him to recover it, the master may, if he please, maintain an action in his own name to be reimbursed (c), which it will often be advisable to do. In some cases the master may sue for this purpose where the agent could not. For instance, if the agent and a third person have joined in applying his property to an illegal purpose, as to the insurance of lottery tickets; for though the agent, being particeps criminis (d), might not be able to recover on account of the rule in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis, yet that rule does not affect the master, who is guilty of no criminality (e). And where the agent disposes of the master's property without either an express or an implied authority, as if he sell his master's goods on credit in a trade the usual course of which is to sell for cash only, the master, though he may affirm the transaction, may, if he please, repudiate it, and recover the property thus tortiously disposed of from the disponee (f). Of course, if the agent has sold with authority, the owner will recover only the balance, if any, after adjustment of accounts with the agent (g).

There is another case in which it has been thought that a principal, in consequence of his having contracted through an agent, may be in a better situation than he would have been if he had contracted personally. It arose in Cornfoot v. Fowke (h), in which an agent who had been employed to let a house, being asked whether there was anything objectionable about it, answered in the negative. It turned out that there was an objection, of which the principal was aware, though the agent was not. It was contended that the contract was invalid on the ground of fraud: for that the knowledge of the principal was that of the agent, whose statement, therefore, would amount to such a misrepresentation as would entitle the contractee to repudiate the agreement; or that, at least, the agent's assertion, being made about a matter of which he knew nothing, and turning out afterwards to be false, amounted to a fraud in law, and might be taken advantage of against the principal. On the other hand, it was said, that there was no fraud in the principal, for he did not make the representation, nor any fraud in the agent, for he did not know that the representation was false. Lord Abinger, C. B., was of the former opinion; but Parke, Alderson, and Rolfe (i), BB., being of the latter, the contract was held valid. The authority of this decision has been questioned (k), and the Court of Queen's Bench repudiated it in a case (l), in which, however, the judgment was reversed on another point in the Exchequer Chamber (m). It is open to question whether the decision turned on more than a point of pleading (n), and the case can no longer be with certainty regarded as good law. No doubt, "a representation which is false in fact, but not known to be so by the party making it, but, on the contrary, made honestly and in the full belief that it is true, affords no ground of action" (o). The same principle has since been frequently affirmed; and in the words of Bramwell, L. J., in Dickson v. Reuter's Telegram Co. (p), "the general rule of law is clear that no action is maintainable for a mere statement, although untrue, and although acted on to the damage of the person to whom it is made, unless that statement is false to the knowledge of the person making it." But it is clear that misrepresentation by an agent amounting to a warranty will be a defence to an action, whether or not there is fraud, if the warranty was within his authority (q). Apparently an action will not lie for specific performance in the circumstances stated in Cornfoot v. Fowke. In Mullens v. Miller (r), Bacon, V.-C., remarked, "A man employs an agent to let a house for him; that authority contains also an authority to describe the property truly; to represent its actual situation, and, if he thinks fit, to represent its value." The employment of an agent ignorant of the facts, and an intentional omission to mention them to him, might be fraudulent, and constitute a ground at least of defence, if not of action (s); at all events, the omission to mention the fact might be evidence for a jury of negligence.

(d) There is no doubt of this position, if the agent can be looked on as a particeps criminis; and he was considered such in Clarke v. Shee, Cowp. 197; but see Jaques v. Golightly, 2 Bl. 1073. It is, generally speaking, safer to sue in the name of the principal than in that of the agent; for if the agent be made plaintiff, anything which would be a good defence against him will be an answer to the action: Gibson v. Winter, 5 B. & Ad. 96, where all the authorities are collected; Wilkinson v. Lindo, 7 M. & W. 81.

Section VI.—Rights of Agents against Third Parties.

Rights of agents against third parties.

The general rule is, that an agent cannot sue or be sued upon a contract avowedly made by him solely on behalf of a principal (t). But a factor or other agent, who has made a contract, in the subject-matter of which he has a special property, may maintain an action thereon in his own name, and that whether he professed to contract for himself or not (u). Thus, an auctioneer may sue in his own name for the price of goods sold by him on the owner's premises, or in a public auction room, and known to be his property (x). So, if an agent have transferred his master's property—for example, made payments under a mistake of fact—under circumstances which give a right to recover it back, he may do so in his own name, though we have seen that it may also be recovered in that of his principal (y). So, he may maintain actions of tort for injuries done to it while in his possession (z). In the above instances, he sues as a trustee for his principal; but there are others in which he may proceed for his own benefit; thus, a factor who has a lien for his balance on the price of goods sold by him, may maintain an action for that price against the buyer. And, if he have previously given him notice not to pay to his principal, payment to the principal would not be a defence to such an action (a), though without notice it has been thought that it would be so (b); and in such a case Eyre, L. C. J., refused to allow the defendant to set off money due to him from the principal (c). There are, however, cases in which great hardships might result if such a set off were not allowed (d); and, generally speaking, where an agent sues in right of his principal, whatever would be a defence against the principal would be so against him. And the declarations and admissions of the principal will be evidence against him (e). A broker ordinarily cannot sue on a contract made by him as broker (f); but this rule may be modified by custom (g).

An agent may also sue upon any contract made with him, in his own name, for an undisclosed principal (h): and, if such a contract be made by deed, he is the only person who can sue on it; for it is an invariable rule of law, that no person can sue upon a deed who is neither party to, nor mentioned in it (i).

Another state of facts also may occur, viz., where a person has entered into a contract as agent for a third person who is named, when in fact he was the principal. It would appear that in such a case the party making the contract could not sue upon it, if it were a contract involving the consideration of personal skill or knowledge, or if it were wholly executory, or had been partially executed, the other contracting party remaining in ignorance of the real principal. But if it were of a description not involving such a consideration, but being of such a nature that partial execution would render the contract obligatory, as if, for instance, it were for the sale of goods, and part of them had been accepted with a knowledge that the person delivering was the real principal, and not a mere agent as he professed to be, then he could maintain an action for its non-fulfilment (k). Nor would the rule apply where the principal was not named (l).

Section VII.—Rights of Third Parties against the Agent.

Rights of third parties against the agent.

An agent, contracting as such for a known and responsible employer, incurs no personal liability to third parties (m). If the individual with whom he contracted knew him to be an agent, knew his principal, and knew that he intended to bind that principal, he will be taken to have trusted to the credit of the principal, and the agent will not be bound. There is an exception to this rule, viz., the case of masters of ships, who, as well as their owners, are responsible on contracts for repairs, or stores, or loans of money for those purposes (n), or on bills of lading signed by them (o). Yet, even in that case, if there be circumstances which show that the owners alone were trusted, they alone will be responsible (p). What constitutes election will be in general a question of fact. Suing without recovering judgment, or merely filing an affidavit of proof against the estate of a bankrupt, will not operate as such election (q). An agent may, however, bind himself by an express undertaking (r). If he contract without disclosing that he has any principal, he is himself the person primâ facie responsible; though the other party may, in most cases, elect to charge the employer on discovering him, yet he need not do so, but may, if he please, continue to look to the agent (s); and by custom the agent's liability may be the same, where, at the time of contracting, he states himself to be an agent, but does not disclose his principal (t). As this subject has been discussed in a previous section, it is better to refer to it for further detail, than to fatigue the reader with a repetition of the authorities there cited (u).

It has also been mentioned (x) that where a British agent contracts for a foreign principal, the British agent is responsible (y). This is said to be for the benefit or convenience of trade, or perhaps it may be a branch of the following general rule, viz., that where there is no responsible employer, the agent shall be held personally liable. Thus, where A. agreed with B. and C. to pave the streets of Putney, and they on behalf of the parish agreed to pay him, they were held personally responsible (z). There is an exception to this rule in favour of government officers acting for the public (a); and possibly this exception may extend to all public officers acting as such (b). A similar rule exists as to the agents of foreign governments. Such governments cannot be sued in the courts of this country, nor will their agents be liable to actions (c). The rule itself seems to be one of evidence, and all cases falling under it to be reducible to the question, to whom was credit given? For it seems, on the one hand, that if a party choose to give credit to irresponsible persons of any description acting by their agent, and it be manifestly intended that the agent's credit shall not be pledged, in such a case the agent will not be responsible (d); while, on the other hand, it is clear that if the agent contract for an irresponsible employer, a strong presumption will arise that he meant to pledge his own credit, and the party dealing with him meant to accept it, unless, indeed, he be a government or public officer acting in his public capacity.

There is another possible case, viz., that of a man contracting as agent for a person from whom he has in reality no authority, e.g., an agent contracting for an alleged freighter. In such a case, if there were no principal existing at the time who could be bound, the person so contracting as agent may be sued on the contract (e).

"Speaking generally," said Lindley, L. J., in Firbank's Executors v. Humphreys (f), "an action for damages will not lie against a person who honestly makes a misrepresentation which misleads another. But to this general rule there is at least one well established exception, viz., where an agent assumes an authority which he does not possess, and induces another to deal with him upon the fact that he has the authority which he assumes."

Rights of third parties against the agent.

On the other hand, if there were an existing person who might have been bound, the person thus contracting will be liable to an action on the case for his misrepresentation (g); unless, indeed, as in the case of Smout v. Ilbery (h), he had once had an authority, the determination of which could not be known to him. He would also be liable to an action on an implied promise that he had authority to make the contract (i); a person who makes as agent a contract or representation "warrants," it is said, that he has authority so to do. But if he fairly contracts as an agent on behalf of a named (k) existing principal, and professes to make that principal liable, he cannot be sued on the contract itself (l).

We have seen that the agent will be personally liable where he has expressly undertaken to be so. It is sometimes difficult to determine whether, upon the true construction of an agreement, the agent making it intended to bind himself or his principal (m). The nature of these difficulties will be best illustrated by a few examples: in Appleton v. Binks (n), a man covenanted for himself, his heirs, &c., for and on the part and behalf of J. S. to do a certain act; and it was held that he, and not J. S., was answerable for its non-performance. On the other hand, in Spittle v. Lavender (o), Lavender entered into an agreement, as agent for and on the part and behalf of S. R., and signed it; at the foot of which agreement were these words: "I hereby sanction this agreement, and approve of Charles Lavender having entered into it on my behalf," and it was held that Lavender was not responsible. In Paice v. Walker (p) the defendants, who signed a contract in the following form; "Sold A. T. Paice, Esquire, London, about 200 quarters of wheat (as agent for John Schmidt & Co. of Dantzig), &c., (signed) Walker and Strange," were held personally liable; while in Gadd v. Houghton (q), no personal liability was held to be created by a sale note in the following form: "We have this day sold to you on account of James Morant & Co., &c." No doubt the general principle is that a person is personally liable on a contract which he signs, and that in order to escape the primâ facie liability there must be something very distinct in the contract.

If the agent exceed his authority, so that his principal is not bound, he will himself be liable for the damage thus occasioned to the other contracting party, although he may have been innocent of any intention to defraud (r), or if he represents that he has authority when he has in fact none.

Rights of third parties against the agent.

The question, whether an agent is personally liable for money paid to him for the use of his principal, under circumstances which would entitle some person to recover it from that principal, involves much difficulty. In the first place, it is clear that if the agent have, without notice to act otherwise, paid over the money to his principal, he never can be called on to refund it (s). But in Cox v. Prentice (t), it was laid down by the court, on the authority of Buller v. Harrison (s), that an agent who receives money for his principal is liable as a principal, so long as he stands in his original situation, and until there has been a change in circumstances by his having paid over the money to his principal, or done what is equivalent to it (u). In that case the defendant received a bar of silver from his principal, and sold it to the plaintiff at a price calculated with reference to the number of ounces which, on assay, it was thought to contain; it turned out afterwards, that it contained fewer ounces than had been supposed, and the plaintiff was held entitled to recover the money overpaid from the defendant, who had not yet handed it to his principal, although he had forwarded an account to him, in which he was credited with the full sum, but which was still unsettled. In Buller v. Harrison (s), the defendant was an insurance broker, and the money sought to be recovered was paid by the plaintiff, an underwriter, in discharge of a loss which turned out to be "a foul loss." It will be observed that in neither of these cases could the principal himself ever by possibility have claimed to retain the money for a single instant, had it reached his hands, the payment having been made by the plaintiff under pure mistake of facts, and being void ab initio, as soon as that mistake was discovered, so that the agent would not have been estopped from denying his principal's title to the money, any more than the factor of J. S. of Jamaica, who has received money paid to him under the supposition of his employer being J. S. of Trinidad, would be estopped from retaining that money against his employer, in order to return it to the person who paid it to him. Besides which, in Buller v. Harrison, had the agent paid the money he received from the underwriter, in discharge of the foul loss, over to his principal, he would have rendered himself an instrument of fraud, which, as we have already seen, no agent can be obliged to do. In Newall v. Tomlinson (v), a further exception was stated. The plaintiffs, cotton brokers, bought of the defendants, also cotton brokers, 74 bales of cotton. Both were acting for undisclosed principals; and, according to the usage of the market, each treated the other as a principal. By a mistake on the part of the defendants in adding up the weights, the plaintiffs paid too much. Before the mistake was discovered the defendants had allowed this sum in the accounts with their principals. The plaintiffs were held to be entitled to recover the money, on the ground that the defendants were not mere agents and did not receive the money to the use of their principals—they received it to their own use. Except in such cases as these, the maxim Respondeat superior has been applied, and the agent is held responsible to no one but his principal (x). Thus, in Stephens v. Badcock (y), the defendant, an attorney's clerk, having received, by his master's orders, rents for the plaintiff, a client, it was held that he was not responsible to the plaintiff, though his employer, the attorney, had since become a bankrupt. So it was held, that an attorney who had received cash for his principal upon a sale which went off, could not be sued by the intended vendee for it (z). Nor can an action for money had and received be brought against the agent, who has received it on behalf of his principal, for the purpose of trying the existence of a right in that principal, thus the right of a lord of the manor cannot be tried in an action against his steward for quit-rent voluntarily paid (a), and these decisions are but just; since, as the agent is estopped from questioning the title of his principal, he would, but for this rule of respondeat superior, be frequently exposed, without any defence, to two different suits in respect of the same subject-matter (b).

But an agent cannot defend himself, even on the ground of payment over to his principal, if he receive money illegally from a party who is not prevented from suing him by the rule in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis (c). This was decided in Miller v. Aris (d), where the money was received by a gaoler from a prisoner for rent of a room illegally let to him, and paid over by the gaoler to his employers (e). Neither do the foregoing remarks extend to cases in which the money gets into the agent's hands, in consequence of a tort committed by him under the directions of, or jointly with, his principal; for in that case the party aggrieved might have sued him in tort, and may, upon the ordinary principle, waive his right to proceed in that form and adopt assumpsit (f). Of course, if an agent pay money to his principal which was not entrusted to him for that purpose, or after the authority was withdrawn, he will not be discharged (g), e. g., if a stakeholder pay over the deposit before the condition on which it was to become due is performed, or after receiving from the depositor a demand for the return of the money (h).

Although there must be special circumstances to render an agent liable on contracts made for his employer, yet it is otherwise if he commit torts while acting in his master's service. In such a case the principal will, it is true, often be liable, but then the agent will invariably be so (i). However, an agent is not answerable to third parties for mere nonfeasance, that is, for neglecting to do, as his master's agent, that which his master is bound and has deputed him to do. Thus, if the servant of a common carrier were to refuse to receive A.'s goods to be carried, on tender of the proper hire, he would not be liable to an action at the suit of A., although the carrier, his master, would, and although the servant would himself be liable to his master for a breach of duty as his agent (k).

We have thus gone through the chief rules which affect the relation of Principal and Agent. The subject of this chapter will, however, be further illustrated by some of those contained in Book the Third, in which it is proposed to treat of Mercantile Contracts. For instance, it is obvious that, in the description of contracts of affreightment, of insurance, or of sale, light must be cast upon the duties of the agents who are employed in the negotiation or execution of those contracts, and who are, of course, bound to know and act upon the rules which govern them. The duty of the agent thus depends, in great measure, upon that of his principal, and consequently upon the nature of those compacts from which the latter takes its origin.

See Nobel's Explosives Co. v. Jones, L. R. 8 A. C. 1. In Roll. Abr. 95, it is laid down, that if the servant of a taverner sells wine that is corrupted, knowing it to be so, no action of deceit lies against the servant, for he did it but as a servant; whence it has been inferred, that a servant is not liable for fraud committed in his master's business; but surely this is difficult to be supported.

BOOK THE SECOND.

CHAPTER I.

INCIDENTS PECULIAR TO MERCANTILE PROPERTY.

Incidents peculiar to mercantile property.

THERE is one circumstance connected with the general law of property which it is fit here to remark: viz., that the law will not permit it to be rendered inalienable by any device whatever; for to permit this would, to use the words of Lord Coke, militate "against trade and traffic, and bargaining and contracting between man and man" (a). First, then, all property in the hands of a merchant becomes transferable by, and subject to, the operation of the bankrupt laws.

Secondly, it is known to be the ordinary rule of law that, where two or more persons are jointly possessed of property, the entire right to it, on the decease of any of them, remains to his survivors, and at length, to the last survivor, who thus becomes entitled to the whole; which incident to joint tenancy is called by our ancient writers the jus accrescendi (b). To this rule there is an exception in the case of partners, of whom Lord Coke says, that "the wares, merchandises, debts, or duties which they have as joint merchants or partners shall not survive, but shall go to the executors of him that deceaseth, and this is per legem mercatoriam, which is part of the laws of this realm, for the advancement and continuance of commerce and trade" (c).

(a) Co. Litt. 223 a. An exception to this rule is allowed in the case of property given or settled to the use of a married woman: Tullett v. Armstrong, 4 My. & Cr. 377; Baggett v. Meux, 1 Phill. 627; 1 Smith's Real and Personal Property, 113.

(b) Litt. 280, 281; 2 Bl. Com. 184.

(c) Co. Litt. 182 a; Comyn's Dig. "Merchant," D. It is observable that the doctrine of Lord Coke, in the above passage, extends to "Debts and Duties," the remedies for which survive, as it is apprehended, notwithstanding some contrary dicta in 2 Lev. 188, 228; Lut. 1493; Noy, 55; Salk. 444; Com. Dig. "Merch." D.

Incidents peculiar to mercantile property.

The principle applies to manufacturers in partnership, and to every description of trade (d). Of the existence of this exception there is no doubt; but it has been questioned whether it could be enforced in courts of common law. It seems admitted on all hands that if real property be held in joint tenancy for the purposes of trade, its exemption from the common rule relating to survivorship can be enforced only through the medium of equity. Thus the legal estate of land of which partners are jointly seised will devolve on the death of any one to the survivors, who can deal with it. But they will be compelled as trustees to account to the persons entitled to the estate of the deceased partner (e). As to the joint tenancy of chattels, Baron Parke, in delivering the judgment of the court in Buckley v. Barber (f), after reviewing all the authorities, observed, "upon the whole, there is no satisfactory authority for the position that the title to partnership chattels survives at law, and the authorities the other way greatly predominate." The Court therefore held the title only survived in equity, but that the principle of this exception, which is for the encouragement of trade, extended to manufacturers in partnership, and to that portion of the partnership stock which consisted of trade fixtures and machinery fixed in their mill, but removeable by them as tenants.

This maxim, Jus accrescendi inter mercatores locum non habet, applies to real property held in partnership for the purposes of trade. Incident to its enforcement is the question which sometimes arises, whether the separate share of each partner is to be considered as real or as chattel property: such share having been always personal in its enjoyment, though freehold in its nature, and having usually been acquired, not as a matter of choice but of necessity, by the sacrifice of part of the chattel

(d) Parke, B., in Buckley v. Barber, 6 Ex. 164, at p. 181. See, as to the limitations of the principle, Brown v. Dale, 9 Ch. D. 78.

(e) Lindley, 5th ed. 341.

(f) 6 Exch. 164, at p. 180. Great doubts were also expressed in this case, whether the surviving partners have a power to sell and give a good legal title to the share of the deceased, even if they sell to pay a partnership debt. Certainly they have no power to deal with it for their own purposes. But see Butchart v. Dresser, 10 Hare, 453; 4 De G. M. & G. 542.

Incidents peculiar to mercantile property.

property of the firm, which its owner would, had it been possible, have desired to continue in its original state of personalty. In the earlier cases on this subject, it appears to have been thought that freehold lands bought with the money, and used for the purposes of the firm, ought not to be considered in equity as converted into personal property, and therefore that, at the death of one of the partners, as equity allows no jus accrescendi among merchants, even in lands, the share of the deceased would descend to his heir, whose right thereto might be enforced in equity (g). This doctrine, however, is overturned (h); and the rule now is, that all property, of what nature soever, bought with the cash and for the purposes of a trading partnership concern, must in equity be looked upon as personal, unless there be an agreement to the contrary, and that as there can be no survivorship in it, a partner's share will on his death pass to his personal representative (i), for whose benefit the surviving partners, or their trustees, will hold it, since in this case the jus accrescendi takes place at law. If, indeed, the partners have stipulated that freehold lands purchased by them shall not be subject to the application of this equitable doctrine, but shall follow the ordinary rules respecting property of that description, or if they act so that such a stipulation may be reasonably inferred from their conduct—if the property is not partnership property—in such a case the rule of equity yields to the ordinary course of law coupled with the intention of the parties, for quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto (j).

Incidents peculiar to mercantile property.

This seems the proper place in which to notice a peculiar rule of law, established in order to favour trade, and concerning certain property in which traders are temporarily interested, viz., that goods delivered to a person exercising a trade, to be carried, wrought or managed in the way of his trade or employment, are for that time privileged from a distress for rent (k). Thus, goods in the hands of an agent, wharfinger, auctioneer, commission agent, or pawnbroker (l), or the carcase of a beast left at a butcher's to be slaughtered (m), are exempted from liability to distress. It has, however, been decided, that machinery bailed to a trader to work the material with is not so privileged (n); nor are horses standing at livery exempt (o). There must be a delivery of the goods by the owner to the trader or manufacturer in order that the goods may be exempted; if A. builds a ship for B., the landlord of A.'s premises may seize under a distress, though the property has passed to B. (p).

The exemption just described is absolute. The necessary implements of a man's trade are also privileged against distress for rent, but (if above the value of five pounds) only when there is sufficient of other distrainable goods to meet the landlord's claim (q). They are not exempt if there be no other sufficient distress except of growing crops; for to seize those might delay the landlord, and put him to inconvenience (r); and they are liable equally with other goods to a distress for poor rates, that being in the nature of an execution (s).

Incidents peculiar to mercantile property.

The Legislature has recently created a further exemption. The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), by s. 45, enacts that live stock which a tenant has agreed with their owner to take in and feed shall not be distrained by the landlord for rent where there is other sufficient distress.

There is another privilege which will be most appropriately noticed along with that against distress afforded to the chattels above mentioned. It is conferred on certain fixtures, which, if set up for ordinary purposes, would not be severable from the freehold by the owner of a particular estate or by his representative, but which, in order to encourage commerce, are removeable when set up by a tenant (t) for commercial purposes. Such is the greater part of the machinery set up by manufacturers, which is now of a description so expensive, that to prohibit its removal from their landlord's premises would be a serious discouragement to persons exercising the trade in which it is used (u). Thus a tenant may remove a fire engine though fixed to the freehold (x), or a fixed engine with boilers and shafting (y). The tenant must remove such fixtures during the term. Between heir and executor the exemption as to trade fixtures does not seem to hold good.

The question whether trade fixtures pass under a mortgage of realty is important as to the Bills of Sale Acts. Sect. 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, enacts that—

"No fixtures or growing crops shall be deemed under this Act

SHIPPING.

SECT. 1. Privileges of a British Ship.
2. What Ships are British.
3. Title to them, how acquired and transmitted.
4. Rights of Part Owners.

SECTION I.—The Privileges of a British Ship (a).

The privileges of a British ship.

THESE, which formerly (b) were very extensive, secured to British ships the exclusive right to import for use into the United Kingdom and the colonies, almost every species of foreign goods, as well as the whole of the coasting trade, and the trade between the United Kingdom and the Channel Islands. But these privileges have been entirely abrogated (c), (a) The subject of British ships is now chiefly regulated by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), and the Acts amending it. See them in the Appendix.

Numerous minute regulations for the survey and equipment of passenger ships sailing from ports in Great Britain for certain destinations, and regulations for preventing the sending of unseaworthy ships to sea from such ports, are contained in the statutes 18 & 19 Vict. c. 119; 26 & 27 Vict. c. 51; 35 & 36 Vict. c. 73; and 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80 (as to which see Thompson v. Farrer, 9 Q. B. D. 372); but as these are not confined to British ships, and a detail of them is beyond the compass of a work like this, it is not attempted.

(b) By way of compensation for the repeal of the privileges formerly secured to British ships, a power is given, by sections 324 and 325 of the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, to the Queen, if British ships, or the articles imported by them, are subject to any prohibitions, restrictions, duties, or charges, in a foreign state, to impose, by an Order in Council, such prohibitions, restrictions and duties upon the ships of that state and the articles imported by them, as to place their ships in British ports on a similar footing, and to countervail the disadvantages to which British trade and navigation are subjected.

(c) As to foreign trade, by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 29; and as to the coasting trade, by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 5.

and the right to assume the national flag and character, and the protection that affords, are the only peculiar privileges which a British ship now enjoys (d). The Queen, however, may by Order in Council impose restrictions upon the vessels of countries which do not extend reciprocity to British vessels (e).

Section II.—What Ships are, properly speaking, British.

What ships are, properly speaking, British.

In order that a ship may be entitled to the name and privileges of a British vessel, she must be owned and registered as one (f).

No ship is deemed British unless she belongs wholly to owners of one or more of three classes (g). The first of these are natural-born British subjects. But even a natural-born subject, who has taken the oath of allegiance to any foreign sovereign or state, is disqualified from being an owner, unless he has subsequently taken the oath of allegiance to Her Majesty, and is, and continues to be, during the whole period of his being an owner, resident within her dominions, or, if not so resident, a member of a British factory, or partner in a firm carrying on business within them. The second class are persons made denizens by letters of denization, or naturalized by or pursuant to any Act of Parliament (h), or any Act or Ordinance of the

(e) 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, ss. 324 and 325.

(f) 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 18 and 19; Leary v. Lloyd, 3 E. & E. 178. By 12 & 13 Vict. c. 29, s. 7, she must likewise have been navigated by a British master and a certain proportion of British seamen; but this provision was repealed by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 131, s. 31. A British ship may now therefore be navigated by any crew. A temporary pass, entitling a vessel to the privileges of a British ship, may be obtained in certain events: 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 98; The Annandale, 2 P. D. 218. As to evidence of the nationality of a British ship, and as to criminal jurisdiction over unregistered British ship, see R. v. Seberg, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 264; R. v. Allen, 10 Cox, C. C. 405.

(g) 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 18. It will be observed that this section considerably qualifies the former enactment, which it supersedes; see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120. East India ships are excepted from the operation of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, by s. 108. As to what is a ship within the meaning of that statute, see 24 Vict. c. 40, s. 2, and The Mac, 7 P. D. 126.

(h) See the reservation in the Naturalization Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 14), s. 14.

Legislature in a British possession, provided they are and continue, during the whole term of their being owners, resident in Her Majesty's dominions, or, if not so resident, members of a British factory, or partners in a house actually carrying on business within those dominions, and they have taken the oath of allegiance to Her Majesty, after being made denizens or naturalized. Thirdly, bodies corporate (i) established under, and subject to the laws of, and having their principal place of business in, the United Kingdom, or some British possession.

What ships are, properly speaking, British.

In the next place a ship must, except in a few instances, presently mentioned, be registered as British, as follows: A ship may be registered (k) at any British port, which will then be deemed her port of registry, or the port to which she belongs. If a ship become the property of British owners at a foreign port, the British consular officer of the port may grant her a provisional certificate, which will have the same force for six months, or until her earlier return to a port where there is a British registrar, as a certificate of registration (l).

The persons by whom registration is to be made are (m):—at any port or other place in the United Kingdom or Isle of Man, approved by the Commissioners of Customs for the registry of ships,—the collector, comptroller, or other principal officer of customs; in the Islands of Guernsey and Jersey,—the principal officers of her Majesty's customs, together with the governor, lieutenant-governor, or other person administering the government of those Islands; in Malta, Gibraltar, and Heligoland,—the governor, lieutenant-governor, or other person administering the government; at any port or place so approved formerly (n) within the limits of the charter, but not under the government of the East India Company, and at which no custom house is established,—the collector of duties, together with the governor,

(i) Even though some of the members composing these bodies may be foreigners: Reg. v. Arnaud, 9 Q. B. 806.

(k) 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 30, 33. And by that statute (ss. 89 and 90), the registry may be transferred from one port to another.

lieutenant-governor, or other person administering the government. At the ports of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay,—the master attendants; and at any other port or place so approved formerly within the limits of the charter and under the government of the East India Company,—the collector of duties, or any other person of six years' standing in the civil service appointed to act for this purpose. At every other port or place so approved within Her Majesty's dominions abroad,—the collector, comptroller, or other principal officer of customs or of navigation laws; or, if there be no such officer resident at such port or place,—the governor, lieutenant-governor, or other person administering the government of the possession. The functions which (as will be seen) are vested in the commissioners of customs, may be performed by the governor, lieutenant-governor, or person administering the government in any possession where ships are registered (o).

The application for registry must be (p), made by one of the owners, or their agent under a written authority; and before registry the ship must be surveyed by a surveyor appointed by the Board of Trade (q), who is to grant a certificate specifying her form and build, and other descriptive particulars, so as to secure her identification.

Before registry, too, every British ship must be thus permanently and conspicuously marked to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade: Her name on each of her bows, her name and port of registry on her stern and on the ship's boats (r); her official number and her registered tonnage on her main beam; and a scale of feet denoting her draught of water on her stem, and each side of her stern posts. These marks must be continued, and no alteration is to be made in them, except the particulars are altered in conformity with the Merchant Shipping Acts. An owner or master who neglects these regulations, or who conceals, removes, alters, defaces, or obliterates any of these marks, save to avoid capture by an enemy, becomes liable to a penalty of 100*l.* (s). But the Board of Trade may exempt any class of ships from any of these regulations (t).

What ships are, properly speaking, British.

The ship, also, must not be described by any other name, and no change of her name shall be allowed without the permission of the Board of Trade, and if she has ceased to be on the register, and an application be made to re-register her, this must be in her old name, unless a change be permitted by the Board of Trade (u). When a ship has ceased to be registered for any other reason than capture or transfer to a person not qualified to own a British ship, before she is registered again she must have been surveyed by a Board of Trade surveyor and certified to be seaworthy (x).

Where, too, an application is made to register as a British ship a ship theretofore foreign, she must, unless with the permission of the Board of Trade, be registered by the name she bore, immediately before the application, as a foreign ship (y). The mode in which the tonnage of the vessel is to be ascertained by measurement is prescribed by the statute, and when once so ascertained is to be deemed to be her tonnage ever after until she has been remeasured (z).

In order to obtain registry, a declaration must be made (a) by every owner (b), and subscribed by him before the registrar of (s) 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 3. See the Act in Appendix. All British ships must be thus marked, unless exempted by the Board of Trade. By 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80, ss. 25 to 28, the position of each deck must be permanently marked on every British ship by a line on the outside; also before entering her outwards from any port in the United Kingdom or immediately afterwards, or, if she be a coaster, before leaving a port, she must be marked with a load line in a prescribed manner under a penalty not exceeding 100*l.*

This declaration sets forth the name, port, and description of the ship; the name and residence of the owner, with other circumstances tending to prove him a subject of Her Majesty, and qualified to own a share in a British ship; a statement of the time and place of her being built, or, if she be foreign built, and these particulars are unknown, that she is foreign built and they are unknown, and her foreign name, or, if condemned, the time, place, and court of condemnation: the name of the master; the share of the declarant in the ship, and a denial that any unqualified person is interested in her (c). If the ship belong to a corporation, the declaration is to be made by the secretary or other duly appointed public officer (d), and the corporate name substituted for the names of the owners (e).

Upon the first registry of a ship the applicant for registry must produce (f), if she be British-built, a certificate (which the builder is required to grant under his hand) containing a true account of her proper denomination and tonnage as estimated by him, and of the time when, and place where she was built, together with the name of her first purchaser; and if any further sale have taken place, the bill or bills of sale under which the ship or share in her has become vested in the party requiring to be registered. same evidence must be produced (g), unless the applicant declares that the time or place of her building is unknown, or the builder's certificate cannot be procured, in which case only the bill or bills of sale under which the ship or share in her became vested in the applicant for registry are required. In the case of a ship condemned by any competent court (h), an official copy of her condemnation must be produced.

The above requisites being complied with, the ship is registered, and a certificate of registry delivered to the applicant (i). This certificate (k) contains the name of the ship and of the port to which she belongs; the details as to her tonnage, build, and description, comprised in the certificate given by the surveyor, which are extremely full and precise; the name of her master; the several particulars as to her origin, stated in the declaration of ownership (l); the name and description of every registered owner, and, if there be more than one, the proportions in which they are interested (m), endorsed upon the certificate. All the above particulars are entered in a book, which the registering officer is required to keep (n); every registry is numbered in progression, and a full return thereof is transmitted by the registrar to the Registrar-General of Shipping and Seamen (o).

In the event of the master being changed (p), if the change be made in consequence of the sentence of any naval court, its presiding officer, or, if the change take place from any other cause, the registrar, or, if there be no registrar, the British consular officer resident at the port where the change happens, is to endorse and sign on the certificate of registry a memorandum of the change, and forthwith report it to the Registrar-General. And the officers of customs at any port in Her Majesty's dominions may refuse to admit any person to do any act as master of the ship, unless his name be inserted in, or indorsed upon, the certificate as her last appointed master.

In some cases a ship must be registered de novo. Formerly it was necessary to go through that ceremony whenever the ship had been altered, so as no longer to correspond with the particulars in her certificate (q), but now (r), if she be altered so as not to correspond with the particulars relating to her tonnage or description contained in the register book, when the alteration is made at a port where there is a registrar, the registrar of that port, and when it is made elsewhere, the registrar of the first port having a registrar at which she arrives, on the receipt of a certificate from the proper surveyor specifying the nature of the alteration, either retains the old certificate of registry, and grants a new one containing a description of the ship as altered, or indorses and subscribes on the existing certificate a memorandum of the alteration. If he be the registrar of the ship's port, he is to enter in his register book the particulars of the alteration, and the fact that a new certificate has been granted, or an indorsement has been made on the existing certificate; but if he be not such registrar, he is forthwith to report the particulars and facts to the registrar of the ship's port, who is to enter them in his register book, and retain the old certificate, which is to be sent to him when a new one has been granted. When this application is made to the registrar of the ship's port, he may, if he thinks fit, instead of registering the alteration, require the ship to be registered de novo. If it be made to any other registrar, he may likewise require this; but in that case he is to grant a provisional certificate, or make a provisional indorsement of the alteration, and report it to the registrar of her port, and then the ship must, on her arrival in the United Kingdom, if registered there, or in the British possession where she is registered, be registered de novo, or she will cease to be registered as British. On any change of property in a ship, the owners may, if they think fit, have her registered de novo (s).

What ships are, properly speaking, British.

It remains to enumerate the cases in which registry is dispensed with, viz.:—

First. Ships not exceeding fifteen tons burden, employed solely on the rivers or coasts of the United Kingdom, or of some British possession within which their managing owners reside (t).

Secondly. Ships not exceeding thirty tons burden, and not having a whole or fixed deck employed solely in fishing or trading coastwise on the shores of Newfoundland or parts adjacent, or in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, or on such portion of the coast of Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick as lie bordering on such gulf (u).

Finally. It is to be observed that no ship is absolutely required to be registered (x). No ship will be recognized as a British ship unless registered. Though unregistered, she will be liable to the payment of dues, and offences committed on board her may be punished (y); but no officer of customs shall grant a clearance or transire to enable her to proceed to sea as a British vessel unless the master produces, upon being required to do so, a certificate of registry; and such officer may retain the ship until the certificate be produced (z).

(z) 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 102.

What ships are, properly speaking, British.

A British ship ceases to be considered such, and her certificate of registry must be delivered up, if she be actually or constructively lost, taken by the enemy, burnt, or broken up; or if she be transferred to persons not qualified to be owners of British ships (a); but in the latter case she may (b) be registered again and restored to her privileges upon her being transferred to persons qualified to be owners of British vessels.

The assumption of the privileges of a British ship contrary to these regulations entails in some instances forfeiture. Thus, if any person use the British flag, and assume the British national character, on board any ship owned wholly or in part by any person not entitled by law to own British ships, for the purpose of making such ship appear to be British, she becomes forfeited; and various officers of Her Majesty may seize and bring her for adjudication before an Admiralty Court, which may deal with her accordingly (c). The concealment of the British character of a ship, or the assumption of a foreign character by a British ship by her master or owners, is a cause of forfeiture (d). The forfeiture takes place when the offence is committed; and even a bonâ fide purchaser for value cannot acquire after that event a good title (e).

If, too (f), any unqualified person, except in the case of interests transmitted otherwise than by transfer, acquires as owner any interest, either legal or beneficial, in a ship using the British flag and assuming the British character, such interest becomes forfeited, and the vessel may be seized in like manner.

SECTION III.—How Title to British Ships may be acquired and transmitted.

How title to British ships may be acquired and transmitted.

Having shown what ships have a right to be called British, we proceed to consider how the title to such ships may be acquired and transmitted.

A ship is a personal chattel, and therefore, generally speaking, subject to the rules which govern that description of property. It may be originally acquired—

1. By building it.

2. By capture from an enemy in time of war, sanctioned by condemnation by a competent court of the capturing power, constituted according to the law of nations. The capture may be either by a Government vessel, or merchant vessel having letters of marque, or, it would appear, by an uncommissioned merchant vessel (g).

Although such capture and condemnation suppose a pre-existing right in some one to the vessel captured, this is enumerated as a mode whereby property in it may be originally acquired, because we are, as must be recollected, treating only of British shipping; and its right to be registered, and consequently to be called British, does not accrue till sentence of condemnation (h). Respecting the court in which this sentence is passed, there is the following rule: That a legal sentence of condemnation cannot, according to the law of nations (which regulates all cases of prize), be passed by the consul or minister of the belligerent power in the country of a neutral power to which the prize has been taken (i). But States in alliance with the captors, and at war with the country to which the prize belongs, are considered as forming one community with the captors; and

(h) This rather had reference to the old state of the law, which did not allow foreign-built ships ever to be registered, except in case of condemnation. See the repealed statute, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 55, s. 5.

a prize carried into such a State may be condemned, either there by a consul belonging to the nation of the captors (k), or in the country of the captors (l).

3. By purchase from a foreigner, or other owner not registered (m). "The purchaser," said Turner, L. J., in Hooper v. Gumm (n), "is bound to make inquiry into the title. A ship is not like an ordinary personal chattel; it does not pass by delivery, nor does the possession of it prove the title to it. There is no market overt for ships."

The title to a British ship may be transmitted by the operation of the bankrupt law, or by death, or by marriage of a female owner (o), or it may be taken and sold in execution, being, as we have seen, a chattel personal.

But the ordinary mode of acquiring property in shipping is by conveyance from a person authorized to dispose of it. Such a person may be—

1st. The Master.

In a case of extreme necessity, the master may sell the ship for the benefit of the owners, though nothing but necessity will justify such a step (p). "Suppose, for instance," said Lord Stowell, in the case of The Fanny and Elmira (q), "a ship in a foreign country, where there is no correspondent of the owners, and no money to be had on hypothecation to put her into repair. Under these circumstances what is to be done? The ship may rot before the master can hear from his owners; and, therefore, if the necessity were clearly shown, with full proof that everything was done optimâ fide, and for the real benefit of the owners, the Court might be disposed to sustain a purchase so made.—But there must be the clearest proof of the necessity; it must be shown not only that the vessel was in want of repair, but likewise that it was impossible to procure the money for that purpose."

How title to British ships may be acquired and transmitted.

The master may in foreign ports hypothecate the ship, freight, or cargo, if that be necessary in order to raise money for her (r). If money cannot be otherwise obtained for repairs, he may sell part of the cargo (s); and may in cases of necessity dispose even of the cargo or ship itself for the benefit of all concerned (t). It lies on those who claim a title through the master to prove the necessity of the sale (u). In Arthur v. Barton (x), it was held that even in an English port a master may, in a case of necessity, borrow money for the use of the ship (y). But this, as is explained hereafter (yy), is on the supposition not merely that the supply of money is necessary, but that the owner cannot be communicated with; and the rule is the same as to goods (z).

In hypothecating the goods the master acts as agent for the owner of them (a). He may tranship goods with which the ship is freighted (b). The extent and nature of the master's agency are determined by the law of the flag (c). The master has also authority over all persons in the ship in matters relating to her navigation and the preservation of good order on board, and he may, in case of disobedience or disorder, administer reasonable correction, his authority in this respect resembling that of a parent over his child, or a master over his apprentice or scholar. But he must take care that there be a sufficient cause for chastisement, and that the chastisement be reasonable, otherwise he will be punishable (d).

2ndly. The Owner.

The conveyance of property in British ships is almost entirely regulated by the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (e). We have already seen how a ship is registered in the first instance; the nature of the book of registry, which the public officers are required to keep; and of the certificate of registry which they deliver to the owners. The property of every British ship is considered by law as divided into sixty-four equal parts, and no person can be registered as owner in respect of any proportion not being a sixty-fourth part (f). Subject to the provisions as to joint-owners or owners by transmission presently mentioned, not more than sixty-four individuals are entitled to be registered at the same time as legal owners of a ship (g). But any number of persons, not exceeding five, may be registered as joint-owners of the ship or any shares in her; and these, whether entitled by purchase or transmission, are to be considered as constituting one person in reckoning the number of persons entitled to be registered. They cannot, however, dispose in severalty of their interest; and no person is to be registered as owner of any fractional part of a share. This rule does not affect the beneficial (h) title of any number of persons, or any company represented by, or claiming through, any registered owner or owners; but no notice of any trust whatever can be entered on the register, or is receivable by the registrar (i). The actual number of persons, therefore, registered in respect of the whole of the shares in the ship may far exceed sixty-four; but every owner must be registered by name, and the style of a firm cannot be used. It is, however, provided that a corporation may be registered by its corporate name (j).

How title to British ships may be acquired and transmitted.

Keeping these rules in mind, we will proceed to consider the mode which the Legislature has pointed out for the transfer (k) of a ship, or any shares in it, from one person to another. By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, every transfer of a registered (l) ship to a person qualified to be an owner of a British ship shall be by bill of sale (m), according to a prescribed form, which is under seal, and which specifies the number and date of registry, the name, build, port of registry, and nature of the ship, with her full description and tonnage. This is to be executed (n) in the presence of, and attested by at least one witness (o). A transferee cannot be registered until he has made a declaration in a given form (p), corresponding with that of an original owner, stating his qualification to be registered, and containing

(k) These provisions are only applicable to vessels requiring registration, consequently vessels under fifteen tons, falling within the exception in 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 19, are not within them; and such vessels, though they be actually on the register, may be transferred like any other chattel: Benyon v. Cresswell, 12 Q. B. 899. These provisions, too, do not include a sale to a person not qualified to be registered.

(l) As to what ships require to be regietered, ante, pp. 188, 189, 195.

(m) Sect. 55. A bill of sale seems always to have been the usual mode of transfer of a ehip: The Sisters, 5 Rob. Adm. Rep. at p. 159. A transfer or assignment of any ehip, or of any share thereof, is not "a bill of sale" within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878: Ex parte Winter, Re Softley, 44 L. J. Bank. 107; Union Bank of London v. Lenanton, 3 C. P. D. 243. No stamp duty is payable on it: 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 9.

a denial that any unqualified person is interested in her. If the declarant reside within five miles of the port of registry, this must be made in the presence of the registrar of the ship's port; but if he reside elsewhere, before any registrar or magistrate. In the case of a body corporate, the declaration also states circumstances showing it to be qualified to own a ship, and is to be made by its secretary, or other public officer, in the presence of the registrar of the port of registry. The bill of sale, together with the declaration, is to be produced (q) to the registrar of the port at which she is to be registered, and he enters the name of the transferee as owner in the register book, and indorses the fact of the entry on the bill of sale, with the date and hour thereof. The provisions do not apply to the transfer of a vessel which is not a British vessel and not registered; and an assignment of such a vessel need not be registered under the Merchant Shipping Act or the Bills of Sale Acts (r).

All bills of sale are to be entered on the register in the order of their production; and the registrar will not be compelled to register a transfer not in the form of a bill of sale (s). Lastly, it is to be observed that the object of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, in prescribing registration, being only to give the ship or shares in the ship a visible owner, who should have absolute authority to dispose of his interests, both at law and in equity, to a bonâ fide transferee (t), the bare fact of registration does not give any title in equity, though it does at law, to one who has no actual title to a ship or shares in a ship; and, therefore, such a person can be compelled to execute a re-transfer and account for the earnings to the rightful owner (u). The fact of a person's name appearing on the re-

In case of change of ownership, the master is also required to produce the certificate of registry to the registrar of her port, or the registrar of the next port she touches at may require him to produce it, in order that the change may be indorsed upon it. gister as owner is not conclusive of his liability for work done or orders given at the instance of the master (v); and a transfer which is on the face of it absolute and unconditional may be shown to be in reality a mortgage (x). It seems clear that an instrument not registered as a bill of sale—e. g., an agreement to transfer a ship—may be enforced (y).

In this statute, too, are contained peculiar provisions (z), enabling the registrar to grant to the owner of a ship (a) a certificate of sale, which will authorise persons specified in it to dispose of the entire ship by sale, in any place out of the United Kingdom, if the ship be registered there, or if she be registered in any British possession, in any other country. This power is revocable, upon notice being given by the registrar granting the certificate to the registrar or consular officer of the place at which the power is to be exercised (b). No sale bonâ fide made to a purchaser for a valuable consideration is to be impeached by reason of the death of the donor of the power before the sale, or by his bankruptcy or insolvency, if the certificate specify the place and time, not exceeding twelve months, within which the power is to be exercised, and the purchaser be without notice. If the sale be made to a person qualified to own a British ship, she must be registered anew; but this may be done upon a declaration being made by the purchaser, as in the ordinary case of a transfer, without a fresh survey. The registrar making this new registration is to indorse the fact on the certificates of sale and former registry, which are to be delivered up to, and transmitted by him to the registrar of her former port, who is to enter the sale in his register. If the ship be sold to a person not qualified to hold a British ship, the purchaser is to produce the certificates of sale and registry to some registrar or consular officer, who is to indorse the fact of the sale and forward them to the registrar of her former port, and he is to enter it in his register. In the case, too, of a sale to such unqualified person, if default be made in the production of these certificates, the purchaser acquires no title, and the owner and the persons to whom the power was granted are liable to a penalty not exceeding 100*l.* If no sale be made, the certificate of sale is to be delivered to the registrar who granted it, and he is to cancel it, and enter the cancellation in his book.

(a) By s. 81, no such certificate is to be granted, except for the sale of an entire ship; but, by s. 76, it seems that such a certificate may be granted to the several owners of the whole of the shares in her.

In case of Mortgage.

The above considerations are applicable to every instance in which property in British shipping is transferred, but there are one or two regulations peculiar to cases of mortgage.

A mortgage of a British ship, or any share in her, must be in a specified form, under seal and attested, which states, as in the case of a transfer, the number and date of the registry and the other particulars of the ship, and "mortgages" the ship as a security for a loan or other valuable consideration (c). An assignment absolute in its terms may operate as a mortgage, if the real nature of the transaction shows it to have been so intended. The mortgage is to be produced to the registrar of the ship's port, who is to record it in the order of time in which he receives it, and to indorse upon it the date and hour of its record (d). As the entire property does not pass to the mortgagee, there of course remains a portion in the mortgagor which he can transfer to a purchaser or second mortgagee. An unregistered mortgage does not appear to be void; but it will be postponed to a registered mortgage or transfer (e). If more than one mortgage be registered, the mortgagees, notwithstanding any express, implied, or constructive notice, have priority over one another according to the date at which each instrument is recorded in the register book, and not of each instrument itself (f). Every registered mortgagee has power absolutely to dispose of the ship or share mortgaged; but if there be several registered mortgagees, a subsequent mortgagee, except under the order of some Court, cannot do this without the concurrence of every prior mortgagee (g). The mortgagee is not to be deemed an owner, nor is the mortgagor to be deemed to have ceased to be the owner, save so far as is necessary for the purpose of making the ship available as a security (h). His contracts, therefore, for the employment of the vessel, made providently and not to the material injury of the mortgagee's security, while he is in possession, will be valid as against the mortgagee (i).

The effect of the mortgage is to give the mortgagee, as against the mortgagor, the right to the immediate possession (j) of the ship, and thereupon to her earnings whensoever they accrue (k).

(f) Sect. 69. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 10, s. 11, the Admiralty Court is empowered to settle any claim arising out of a registered mortgage. "The mortgagee of a ship does not, ordinarily speaking, or by a mortgage such as existed in the present case, obtain any transfer by way of contract or assignment of the freight; nor does the mortgagor of a ship undertake to employ the ship in any particular way, or indeed to employ the ship so as to earn freight at all.

"When a mortgagee takes possession he becomes the master or owner of the ship, and his position is simply this: from that time everything which represents the earnings of the ship, which had not been paid before, must be paid to the person who then is the owner, who is in possession. The owner then in possession happens to be the mortgagee, and it is in consequence of his filling that position, and not by virtue of any contract, or any antecedent right, that he becomes the person entitled to receive the freight. But that right is itself checked by another consideration. All that he can receive is that which the ship was in the course of earning, either by way of express contract or, which is the same thing, by carrying goods upon a quantum meruit" (l).

If, therefore, the mortgagee takes possession of the ship (m), or does an act equivalent to it (n), as he may, during a voyage, he is entitled to receive the freight earned in that voyage (o). He may employ the ship in whatever manner he pleases, provided it be bonâ fide and provident (p); and so long as he remains in possession the only effect of the act seems to be to preserve to the mortgagor his equitable and insurable (q) interests and a right to a re-transfer of his ship, as soon as the mortgagee shall have recouped himself out of her earnings, or he shall have been repaid the sum agreed to be secured (r), unless he have exercised his power of sale.

Although under an enactment similar to this it was doubted (s) whether a mortgagee had sufficient interest to entitle him to recover more than the amount of the mortgage debt, upon a policy of insurance for the entire value of the ship, unless at the time of executing the policy it was his intention to include the interest of the mortgagor for the sake of the latter, it may, nevertheless, be questioned whether a mortgagee, either in or out of possession, may not recover the full value insured, quite irrespective of any intention he may have had when effecting the policy (t). On the whole, it would seem that the mortgagee will be able to recover only to the extent of his debt, unless it appear that he intended to cover not only his own interest, but that of the mortgagor (u). There can be no doubt that in equity, and possibly at law (x), he would be liable as trustee for the excess of the sum recovered beyond his debt, and perhaps the premium.

The mortgagee is preferred (y) to the trustee of the mortgagor in case of bankruptcy, and protected from having the mortgaged property considered as in the bankrupt's order and disposition.

A certificate of mortgage, corresponding in many respects with a certificate of sale (z), may be granted by the registrar; and similar provisions, as in the case of a certificate of sale, are enacted, rendering a mortgage under it valid, notwithstanding the death, bankruptcy, or insolvency of the owner. The mortgage is to be indorsed by a registrar or British consular officer on the certificate of mortgage, and is to have priority over all mortgages subsequent to the date of the entry of the certificate in the register. If there be more than one mortgage under the certificate, the mortgagees are to have priority according to the dates of the indorsement of their charges on the certificate.

A mortgage may be transmitted or transferred by death, bankruptcy, &c., and such transmission or transfer is to be registered (z). A mortgage may be the subject of an equitable deposit, and such deposit will prevail against the trustee under a bankruptcy (a). Upon the discharge of any mortgage, satisfaction is likewise to be entered in the registry (b).

Section IV.—Rights of Part Owners.

Rights of part owners.

It remains to consider the rights of part owners of a ship amongst themselves.

It is possible that joint tenancy may be created in a ship, as well as in any other chattel, by grant to several persons jointly; and if it be, the rule jus accrescendi inter mercatores locum non habet will apply to it (c). But if several persons be registered as joint owners of shares in a ship, it would seem that, at least at law, they would survive, as by s. 37 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, no person can be registered as owner of a fractional part of a share. The operation of the Act occasions this sort of property to be usually conveyed in distinct shares of one or more sixty-fourth parts, the owners of which are tenants in common of the vessel, and would hold it subject to the general rule of the common law, which permits any one tenant in common to seize upon the chattel, and regulate the mode of its enjoyment, to the exclusion of the rest (d), were it not that public policy steps in and exempts this sort of property from a rule, which, if applied to it, might prove injurious to commerce. ingly, if the owners themselves have not precluded all dispute by agreeing in the choice of a ship's husband, or managing owner, and delegating the care of their interests to him, the Court of Admiralty (e) interferes by arresting the ship, and preventing the majority of owners from sending her abroad against the will of the minority, without first entering into a stipulation, in a sum equal in value to the shares of the dissentients, either to bring back the ship or pay the value of their shares (f). On giving this security they are permitted to send the ship to sea (g), and if the minority are in possession of it, may take it out of their hands for that purpose by a warrant of the Court. But the dissentient owners bear no part of the expense, and are entitled to no part of the profit of the voyage to which they have disagreed (h). In case the owners be equally divided in opinion, either half may apply to the Court to interfere in the manner above stated (h).

As the Court of Admiralty may arrest the ship for the protection of one part of the owners against another, so it may for the protection of the owner or owners against a wrong doer (i). The Court may order the ship to be sold (k).

The ordinary mode for part owners to obtain an adjustment of the ship's accounts was by suit in a Court of equity, or, since the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, by suit in the Court of Admiralty (l), and now by action in the High Court of Justice (m); they may, however, by naming a ship's husband, and inserting special provisions in his appointment (n), entitle themselves to an action against him, in case he fail in making up his account, and dividing the profits (o); while, on the other hand, the ship's husband, if he have advanced money for outfits, may sue each of the owners for his proportion (p). Sect. 36 of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80, requires the name of the managing owner to be registered (q). Part owners resemble partners with respect to the concerns of the ship, and are therefore, generally speaking, all liable to the full extent for debts contracted for its repair and other necessary expenses, which can be shown or presumed to have been incurred with their assent (r). But this liability arises in every case out of contract, and is not an incident inseparable from the registered ownership of the vessel; and therefore, if the registered owners can show that the expense was not incurred on their credit, they will not be liable for it. And, in like manner, any one of them will be exempted who can show that he has not pledged his responsibility; for the mere legal ownership, per se, is in no case sufficient to render an owner liable (s).

Where the ship is under the management of the master and the owners divide the profits, the master is, with respect to her concerns, primâ facie (t) agent for them all. There will be a CHAPTER III.

GOODWILL AND TRADE MARKS.

Goodwill and trade marks.

THERE is another sort of property, if property it can be called, of a nature so exclusively mercantile as to deserve a separate mention. I mean the goodwill of a business, which, though arising from various and often accidental circumstances —such as the situation of a house, the changes in a neighbourhood, and even the prejudices of customers—has been often recognised in Courts of equity and law as an existing and valuable interest (a); and therefore, when property to which it attaches is sold under their decrees, they will direct that steps be taken to impress the purchaser with a just notion of its value (b). On a dissolution of partnership the goodwill, if any, is sold as partnership assets for the benefit of the partners collectively (c). But where the profits of the business result almost entirely from confidence placed in the personal skill of the party employed, as (a) "Goodwill, I apprehend, must mean every advantage—every positive advantage, if I may so express it, as contrasted with the negative advantage of the late partner not carrying on the business himself—that has been acquired by the old firm in carrying on its business, whether connected with the premises in which the business was previously carried on, or with the name of the late firm, or with any other matter carrying with it the benefit of the business." Per Wood, V.-C., in Churton v. Douglas, John. at p. 188, cited by Jessel, M. R., in Ginesi v. Cooper, 14 Ch. D. at p. 600. See Steuart v. Gladstone, 10 Ch. D. at p. 658; Reynolds v. Bullock, 47 L. J. Ch. 773; Cooper v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 25 Ch. D. at p. 479; Sebastian on Trade Marks, 2nd ed. 271.

The assignment of a goodwill and business conveys the exclusive right as between the vendor and the purchaser to use the trade name under which the business was carried on: Levy v. Walker, 10 Ch. D. at p. 448, per James, L. J. It is recognised as partnership assets: Smith v. Everett, 27 Beav. 446; Mellersh v. Keen, 28 Beav. 453; Hall v. Barrows, 4 De G. J. & S. 150.

Goodwill and trade marks.

in the case of surgeons or solicitors (d), the goodwill is too insignificant to be taken notice of. By the conveyance of a shop the goodwill passes, although not specifically mentioned (e), and the goodwill of trade premises, as distinguished from goodwill, the result of personal reputation, passes to a mortgagee (f). A sale of stock and goodwill for 60*l.* requires a stamp, not being a mere sale of goods (g).

The sale of a goodwill, in the absence of any express stipulation (h), does not preclude the seller from setting up the same kind of business again in the same neighbourhood (i), if he do not describe himself as setting up the identical business that has been purchased, or interfere with the customers in the old business (k), or a solicitor (l) from soliciting or dealing with (m) the customers of the old business. In Labouchere v. Dawson (n), Romilly, M. R., laid down the law differently, and his view was adopted in Ginesi v. Cooper (o) by Jessel, M. R. This doctrine was subsequently extended by the latter, in Walker v. Mottram (p), to a sale by a trustee in bankruptcy. But the Court of Appeal held that the doctrine, if correct in a voluntary sale, did not extend to compulsory sales; and in the later case of Pearson v. Pearson (q), the same Court (Lindley, L. J., dissenting) held, that the doctrine could not be supported in voluntary sales, and that Labouchere v. Dawson was wrongly decided.

Upon the sale of a goodwill it is usual for the vendor to undertake not to carry on the same business within prescribed limits: such a stipulation, if the limits be reasonable according to the nature of the business, is perfectly valid (r); and the circumstance that the restraint is unlimited in point of time will not vitiate it (s). Upon the sale of a lease with such a covenant, there is no implied term that it is to cease at the expiration of the lease, or on the purchaser ceasing by himself or his assigns to carry on the business (t).

A somewhat similar right is that to trade marks, i.e., marks intended to denote the makers of articles or certain qualities of goods (u). The sale of a business includes not only the goodwill, but any trade mark belonging to it (x). The right to be protected against infringement of trade marks was to a certain extent recognized at common law; and before there was any legislation on the subject it was well settled that—

"When any one adopted a mark so closely resembling the trade mark of the plaintiff that it would be likely to be mistaken for it, and put it on his goods and sold them, knowing that though the persons to whom he sold them were well aware that they were not the plaintiff's make, yet that they were meant to be sold to others who would see only the trade mark, and were likely to be deceived by its resemblance to that of the plaintiff, he might be properly found to have knowingly and fraudulently sold the goods as and for the plaintiff's goods: Sykes v. Sykes (y). And, so far, there was no difference between law and equity. But at law it was necessary to prove that an injury had been actually done. In equity it was enough to show that the defendant threatened to do, and would if not prevented do that injury" (z).

Trade marks are now regulated by the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57) (a). One at least of the following particulars is required by sect. 64 for a trade mark (b):—

(a.) A name of an individual or firm, printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner; or

(b.) A written signature, or copy of a written signature, of the individual or firm applying for registration thereof as a trade mark; or

(c.) A distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label, ticket, or fancy word or words not in common use (c).

Proceedings cannot be instituted for infringement of a trade mark, which can be registered under this Act, unless the trade mark has been so registered (d). Registration under the Act is equivalent to public use of the trade mark (e), and is primâ facie evidence of the proprietor's right to the exclusive use of the trade mark (f). After the expiration of five years registration is conclusive evidence of the right (g), unless the trade mark having been in common use at the time of registration ought not to have been registered (h). Sects. 103 and 104 of the Act (as amended by 48 & 49 Vict. c. 63, s. 6), make provisions for the making of international and colonial arrangements for the protection of registered trade marks. A trade mark may pass to the trustee in bankruptcy as "goods and chattels," unless it owes its sole value to the proprietor's personal skill. It may be assigned and transmitted, but only in connection with the goodwill of the business concerned with the goods to which it relates (i), and trade marks registered as a series can be transferred only as a whole (k). The assignee of a registered trade mark may take proceedings to prevent its use without having registered the assignment (l). Being of the nature of property, it is immaterial whether a registered trade mark has been fraudulently or innocently infringed; there is a remedy in either case (m).

CHAPTER IV.

PROPERTY IN NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS.

Property in negotiable instruments.

THE common and well-known rule of the law is, that property in a chattel personal cannot, except by sale in market overt, be transferred to a vendee, however innocent, by a party who does not himself possess it (a). The contrary, however, is the case with respect to negotiable instruments, a transfer of which, when in that state in which by law and the usage of trade they accustomably pass from one man to another by delivery, causes the property in them, like that in coin, to pass along with the possession (b), provided that the transferee has been guilty of no fraud (c) in taking them, in which case he would be forced to bear the loss (d). Gross negligence, unless amounting to evidence of mala fides, will not be a sufficient answer when consideration has been given for a bill of exchange or other negotiable security.

An instrument is, properly speaking, negotiable when the legal right to the property secured by it is transferable from one man to another by its delivery. Of this description are bills of exchange and promissory notes payable to bearer or indorsed in blank (e), and exchequer bills (f). Such were held a bond, whereby the King of Prussia bound himself and his successors to every person who should for the time being be the holder of the bond, and which was proved to be usually negotiated in the English market by delivery (g); and scrip in a foreign loan, also shown to be in this country negotiable by delivery, according to the custom of merchants (h). On the other hand, Prussian Consolidated 4½ per cent. bonds, proved to be negotiable in Prussia, were held not to be so here in the absence of any custom in this country (i).

"The common law of England does not allow a party to a contract to transfer his right under the contract to another person, except in certain cases. Such a transfer of a chose in action could, of course, be made under the provisions of a statute: and in the case of instruments, which by the custom of merchants, recognized by the law of England, had become negotiable instruments. But it appears to me that in order to establish such an exception to the common law rule, some custom of merchants obtaining in this country must be proved, or some English statute must be relied upon"(k).

According to the judgment of Cockburn, C. J., in Goodwin v. Robarts (l), and apparently according to the opinion of the Court of Appeal in Picker v. The London and County Banking Co. (m), the custom of merchants may make any instrument negotiable. But that is at variance with the opinion expressed by Blackburn, J., in Crouch v. Crédit Foncier (n), which, though often doubted, has never been expressly overruled. The plaintiff had purchased for value without notice a debenture issued by the defendants from a person who had stolen it. It was held that it was not competent to the defendants to attach to the instrument the incident of negotiability; the alleged custom being of recent origin did not make the instrument negotiable.

"Incidents," says Blackburn, J., "which the parties are competent by express stipulation to introduce into their contracts, may be annexed by custom, however recent, provided that it be general, on the ground that they are tacitly incorporated in the contract. If the wording of an instrument is such as to exclude this tacit incorporation, no usage can annex the incident. But where the incident is of such a nature that the parties are not themselves competent to introduce it by express stipulation, no such incident can be annexed by the tacit stipulation arising from usage. It may be so annexed by the ancient law merchant, which forms part of the law, and of which the Courts take notice. Nor, if the ancient law merchant annexes the incident, can any modern usage take it away. Thus, in Edie v. East India Co. (o) there was a verdict of the jury, founded on strong evidence, that, according to usage in London, an indorsement to an indorsee by name without any further words was restrictive; but the Court of King's Bench decided that the evidence should not have been admitted, the law merchant being known to the Court to be that it was not restrictive. And in Partridge v. Bank of England (p) there was the exact converse. There the dividend warrants of the Bank of England were in the form of cheques payable to a particular person, Partridge, without any words to make them transferable, which, therefore, were by the general law merchant not transferable. The Court of Exchequer Chamber gave judgment non obstante veredicto, on a plea on which it had been found that by custom for sixty years such dividend warrants were negotiable. We have already intimated our opinion that it is beyond the competency of the parties to a contract by express words to confer on the assignee of that contract a right to sue in his own name. And we also think it beyond the competency of the parties by express stipulation to deprive the assignee of either the contract, or the property represented by it, of his right to take back his property from any one to whom a thief may have transferred it, even though that transferee took it bonâ fide and for value. As these stipulations, if express, would have been ineffectual, the tacit stipulations implied from custom must be equally ineffectual."

But it may be doubted whether these observations would strictly be followed. Apparently if an instrument, for example, scrip, purporting or representing that it passes from hand to hand by delivery, is deposited with an agent who passes it to a bonâ fide holder for value, the owner will be estopped from denying that the security is, what it appears to be, negotiable (r).

Property in negotiable instruments.

I call those instruments negotiable, by delivery of which the legal right to the property which they secure may be conveyed. For there are other instruments (s), which, though saleable in the market by the usage of merchants, can yet only be put in suit in the name of the original contractee, and are not, properly speaking, negotiable. Bills of lading, dock warrants, delivery orders and wharfingers' certificates are sometimes called negotiable; and by custom and statute law they have acquired some of the incidents of negotiability. But, as will be subsequently pointed out, they do not possess all. Instruments which in one state would be negotiable, may, by being put into another, cease to be so. Thus, though a bill or note will be negotiable if indorsed in blank, yet the holder may, by a special or restrictive indorsement, determine its negotiability (t). So a cheque may be rendered not negotiable by crossing (u).

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 100, negotiable securities are excepted from the general rule as to the restoration of stolen property on the conviction of the thief.

SECTION I.—Their Definition, Requisites, and Form.

Their definition, requisites, and form.

AN Act to codify the law relating to bills of exchange, cheques, and promissory notes (The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), was passed on the 18th August, 1882, and came at that date into operation. It includes the greater portion of the common and statute law relating to the subject, and it assimilates the law of England and Scotland. Some new terms, such as "holder in due course" (sect. 29), are introduced and defined. The statute makes a few alterations in the law, and it sets at rest several doubtful points. Except so far as inconsistent with the express provisions of the Act, the rules of the common law continue to apply (a).

(a) Sect. 97 (2). See as to the construction of the statute, Lord Blackburn in McLean v. Clydesdale Banking Co., 9 App. Cas. at p. 106; and Leeds and County Bank v. Walker, 11 Q. B. D. 84; and Vagliano v. Bank of England, see infra.

A bill of exchange is defined as follows:—

"A bill of exchange is an unconditional order in writing, addressed by one person to another, signed by the person giving it, requiring the person to whom it is addressed to pay on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time, a sum certain in money to or to the order of a specified person, or to bearer" (b).

He who makes or gives the order is called the drawer; he to whom it is addressed to pay is called the drawee, and, if he accepts it in the manner specified in sect. 17 of the Act, the acceptor. Bearer is defined by sect. 2 as "the person in possession of a bill or note which is payable to bearer"; "holder" is defined by sect. 2 as "the payee or indorsee of a bill or note who is in possession of it, or the bearer thereof," and "holder in due course," by sects. 29 (1) and 30 (2), "as one who has taken a bill complete and regular on the face of it, before it was overdue and without notice that it had been previously dishonoured, in good faith and for value, and without notice at the time the bill was negotiated to him of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it."

A promissory note is thus defined:—

"An unconditional promise in writing made by one person to another, signed by the maker, engaging to pay on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time a sum certain in money, to or to the order of a specified person or to bearer.

"An instrument in the form of a note payable to maker's order is not a note within the meaning of this section, unless and until it is indorsed by the maker" (c).

He who promises to pay is called the maker, he to whom the promise is made the payee. A bank note is a promissory note issued by a banker and payable on demand (d). A cheque is defined to be "a bill of exchange drawn on a banker payable on demand" (e).

Bills of exchange derived their peculiar properties from the custom of merchants; promissory notes from the stat. 3 & 4 Ann.

c. 9 (f), which placed them on the same footing with bills of exchange. That Act was passed in consequence of the refusal of Lord Holt, C. J., to concede to the custom which had sprung up among merchants, of treating promissory notes as negotiable, the effect which would, at a somewhat later period, probably have been attributed to it. His Lordship, departing, perhaps, somewhat from that excellent good sense which usually characterised him, treated the endeavour to uphold the negotiability of notes with some indignation, saying that it proceeded from the obstinacy and opinionativeness of the merchants, who were endeavouring to set the law of Lombard Street above the law of Westminster Hall (g).

Their definition, requisites, and form.

Although a promissory note, while in its original shape, bears no resemblance to a bill, yet when indorsed it is similar to one; for then it is an order by the indorser of the note upon the maker to pay to the indorsee. The indorser is, as it were, the drawer; the maker, the acceptor; and the indorsee, the payee (h). The reader, bearing this similitude in his mind, and the exceptions stated in sect. 89 (3), will easily be able to apply to notes the decisions hereinafter cited concerning bills, and vice versâ.

Sect. 55 (1), states that the drawer of a bill by drawing it—

"(a) Engages that on due presentment it shall be accepted and paid according to its tenor, and that if it be dishonoured, he will compensate the holder or any indorser who is compelled to pay it, provided that the requisite proceedings on dishonour be duly taken;

"(b) Is precluded from denying to a holder in due course the existence of the payee and his then capacity to indorse."

If the drawee refuse to accept, the contract is broken, and the Statute of Limitations begins to run from that period (i), for the

(i) Whitehead v. Walker, 9 M. & W. 506. In one case, Cooper v. Turner, 2 Stark. 497, the lapse of thirteen years was held sufficient to raise a presumption of the claim being satisfied. But this is not a presumption of law: Brown v. Rutherford, 14 Ch. D. p. 690.

Their definition, requisites, and form.

engagement is not a double one; first, that the drawee shall accept upon presentment for acceptance; and secondly, pay upon presentment for payment; but single, namely, in the case of a bill payable after sight, that the drawee shall, upon the bill being presented to him in a reasonable time after date, accept the same, and having accepted, shall pay it when duly presented for payment (k); and in the case of a bill payable after date, that the drawee shall accept it, if it is presented to him before the time of payment, or if it is not presented for acceptance at all, then that he shall pay it when duly presented for payment (l).

Time runs in favour of an indorser or drawer from the time when he becomes liable to an action at the suit of the holder, that is, in general, when notice of non-acceptance or non-payment is given. In the case of a cheque payable on demand or undated, time runs from the date when it is given (m). But when a note is payable three months after demand or notice, time runs from the date at which it is payable. With reference to a note payable three months after demand, the Court of Appeal decided that the admission by the payee of the receipt of interest was an acknowledgment that money was payable, and that there had been a demand, and that the statute ran from the date of the payment of the interest (n).

No particular form of words is required to constitute a bill or note (o); and, if it appear doubtful for which of the two any instrument was intended, it may be treated as either (p). But there must be an order or promise to pay—the mere acknowledgment of a debt, such as an I O U, is not a promissory note (q);

"I do acknowledge myself to be indebted to A. in £ to be paid on demand for value received." The words to be paid being held to amount to a promise to pay.

"I have received the imperfect books, which, together with the cash overpaid on the settlement of your account, amounts to 80*l.*, which sum I will pay in two years," was held to be a note: Wheatley v. Williams, 1 M. & W. 533. But "I have received the sum of 20*l.* which I borrowed from you, and I have to be accountable for the said sum with interest," was held to be an agreement, not a note: Horne v. Redfearn, 4 Bing. "Memorandum. Mr. Sibree has this day deposited with me 500*l.* on the sale of 10,300*l.* 3 per cent. Spanish, to be returned on demand.

certain sum: for a promise to pay J. E. "65*l.*, with all other sums that may be due to him," or to pay 13*l.*, and all fines according to rule, is not a promissory note (u). Moreover, the money must be payable unconditionally. If it contain any condition precedent, or defeasance, or be payable at an uncertain time, or out of an uncertain fund, it is no bill or note (x). In one case on this subject, the instrument was in the following form:—

"£1,200. "Warrington, 4th March, 1824.

"On demand, we promise to pay to Mr. George Clarke, or his order, Twelve Hundred Pounds, for value received in stock of ale, brewing vessels, &c., this being intended to stand against me, the undersigned Mary Perceval, as a set-off for that sum left me in my father's will above my sister Ann's share.

Thomas Perceval.

(Witness) William Hall. Mary Perceval."

It was held that the 1,200*l.* was not payable at all events, and the instrument therefore not a promissory note (y).

"An order to pay out of a particular fund is not unconditional (z) within the meaning of this section (sect. 3); but an unqualified order to pay, coupled with an indication of a particular fund out of which the drawee is to reimburse himself, or a particular account to be debited with the amount, or a statement of the transaction which gives rise to the bill, is unconditional" (a).

the dividends and interest due on the capital and dividends registered in the books (of the Bank) in the name of C. and B.," was held a bill of exchange (b).

An order by the freighter of a ship to pay money on account of freight (c), an order to pay so much as the drawer's quarter's half-pay by advance (d), or to pay 25*l.*, a portion of value deposited as security for the payment thereof (e), or I promise to pay M. A. on demand £—— by giving up clothes and papers (f), or as per memorandum of agreement (g), or when J. S. comes of age, to wit, June 12, 1750 (h), or six weeeks after the death of A. B. (i),— have been held payable at all events, and therefore good; for, to use the words of Willes, C. J., in the last case, "If a bill of exchange be made payable at never so distant a day, yet if it be a day that must come, it is no objection to the bill." Therefore a note payable within two months after his Majesty's ship A. B. shall be paid off, is good; for, it is said, the paymaster being Government, it is morally certain that payment will be made (k).

Sect. 88 provides that the maker of a note by making it engages that he will pay it according to its tenour; and he is precluded from denying to a holder in due course the existence of the payee and his then capacity to indorse.

A bill of exchange must be in writing, which the interpretation clause of the Act declares includes print (l). It may be partly written or partly printed or wholly printed. The signa-

But this case seems irreconcileable with Griffin v. Weatherby, L. R. 3 Q. B. 753, where an order to pay so much "on account of moneys advanced by me for the Isle of Man Slate Quarry, &c.," was held to be a bill of exchange.

ture of any person signing a bill may be by a mark (m). A person signing need not do so with his own hand; it is sufficient if the signature is written on the bill by another person by or under his authority; and in the case of a corporation it is sufficient that the instrument be sealed with the corporation seal (n). An instrument is not the less a note because it contains a memorandum that the maker has deposited title deeds with the payee as a collateral security (o). But an instrument, the effect of which was—I promise to pay 600*l.* by instalments, and I agree to set off 95*l.*, was held not to be a note; for besides its complexity, the 95*l.* could not be payable to an indorsee (p).

"An instrument expressed to be payable on a contingency is not a bill, and the happening of the event does not cure the defect" (q).

"(1) When a bill contains words prohibiting transfer, or indicating an intention that it should not be transferable, it is valid as between the parties thereto, but is not negotiable" (r).

"(4) A bill is payable to order which is expressed to be so payable, or which is expressed to be payable to a particular person, and does not contain words prohibiting transfer or indicating an intention that it should not be transferable."

This adopts the rule of Scotch law on the subject. Before the Act a bill or note without the addition of words authorizing transfer was not negotiable (s).

"Where a bill purports to be indorsed conditionally, the condition may be disregarded by the payer, and payment to the indorsee is valid whether the condition has been fulfilled or not" (t).

This alters the old law, according to which an indorsement, if written on a bill or note at the time of making it, and rendering it payable only on certain conditions, deprived it of the character of negotiability, and turned it into an agreement as between the parties privy to it (u). The indorsement on a note of a mere reference to an agreement for the purpose of earmarking it as the note named in that agreement, does not make it conditional (v). Nor can such an instrument ever be rendered conditional by a contemporaneous parol agreement; for it is one of the first principles of the law of evidence, that oral testimony shall never be permitted to vary or contradict the terms of any written contract (x). A written contemporaneous agreement, also, by the payee with the makers and third persons, that payment shall be postponed, will not control the operation of a note (y). But it may be shown, as between the immediate parties to the bill and others than a holder in due course, that the delivery was conditional for a special purpose only, and not with the intention of passing the property (z).

Their definition, requisites, and form.

Although conformity with one of the above definitions is in general strictly required, yet if a word be fraudulently inserted by the maker or drawer, in order to prevent the instrument from acquiring the legal properties of a bill or note, as where the maker of a note worded it thus—"I promise not to pay," the Court will reject the word so fraudulently introduced, and read the instrument without it (a).

£100 : 0 : 0 London, January 1, 1889.

[Stamp.] Two months after date I promise to pay to Mr. ——, or order, One Hundred Pounds, for value received.

JOHN WOOD.

The principal parts of these instruments are the amount, stamp, date, time for payment, place of payment, designation of payee, name of drawer, and name of drawee. We will consider these in order.

Amount.—It is usual to specify this in figures on the upper left-hand corner of the instrument as well as in writing in the body. Where a difference appears between the words and figures, the Act (b) states, in accordance with the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Saunderson v. Piper (c), that the sum denoted by the words is the amount payable.

A bill of exchange may now be drawn for any amount; 48 Geo. 3, c. 88, s. 2, which made void all negotiable bills or notes made in England, if for less than 20*s.*, is repealed by the second schedule of the Bills of Exchange Act. A promissory note for less than 20*l.* must by 7 Geo. 4, c. 6, s. 10, be payable where issued, although it may also be payable elsewhere. And promissory notes in England for less than 5*l.*, if payable to bearer on demand, are void (d).

Their definition, requisites, and form.

Stamp.—The stamp is an essential part of every inland bill and note, and formerly though a note purported to have been drawn abroad, and were in the hands of an innocent holder, yet any party might show that it was actually made in this country, and insist upon the want of a stamp (e). If unstamped, a bill or note is inadmissible in evidence (except in criminal proceedings), and unavailable, even as an admission of a debt from one of the parties therein mentioned to the other (f). The duty of 1*d.* on a bill for the payment of money on demand may be denoted by an adhesive stamp (g), which is to be cancelled by the person by whom the bill is signed before he delivers it out of his custody (h). But in all other cases the paper on which a bill or note made in Great Britain, unless (i) it purports to be made abroad, is written, must have the stamp previously impressed upon it, for if that be neglected, it cannot afterwards be stamped (k), except in the single case of its having been impressed with a stamp of sufficient amount but of improper denomination, when it may be done upon payment of a penalty (l). Where stamp duty is payable, its amount will not be increased by the circumstances of interest being reserved from the date of the bill or note (m), or even from a day prior to the date (n).

A bill or note drawn abroad, or at sea, requires no stamp under any English Act of Parliament (o). Thus, where a person resident at Antwerp desired his correspondent in England to fill up a bill of exchange, and return it to him, which was done, and he then signed it as drawer at Antwerp, this bill was held to have been virtually drawn abroad, and to require no stamp (p). But if expressed to be payable, or it be actually paid, or endorsed, or in any manner negotiated in the United Kingdom, every person into whose hands it shall there come unstamped, before he presents it for payment, indorses, transfers, or in any manner negotiates or pays it, must affix on it and cancel an ad valorem adhesive stamp (q). So, if a bill or note purport to be made abroad, though in reality it be made in Great Britain, an adhesive stamp must be used (r). The bill will be presumed to have been stamped at the proper time (s). Though the foreign country in which a bill is issued may have a law requiring it to bear a particular stamp, it will not be invalid solely on that account (t).

Foreign bills are usually drawn in sets; it is only necessary that one of the set should be duly stamped (u). The whole constitute one bill (x).

The following are the rates of duty on bills and notes (y), except bank notes, which bear a different rate :—

Their definition, requisites, and form.

There is a proviso in stat. 9 Geo. 4, c. 14, usually called Lord Tenterden's Act, sect. 8, which enacts that "no memorandum or other writing made necessary by this Act shall be deemed to be an agreement within the meaning of any statute relating to the duties of stamps." Under this proviso, however, an unstamped note cannot be given in evidence for the purpose of avoiding the statute (a), though an unstamped agreement may (b).

There are some instruments, which, though not properly speaking bills or notes, because payable out of an uncertain fund, or upon a condition or contingency, yet require stamps by the words of the statute 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, ss. 48 and 49 (c). If coming within the words of this section, and not a mere assignment of a debt, such instruments cannot be stamped after being made (d).

With regard to drafts, orders, and cheques, these are bills of exchange for the purpose of the Stamp Act. Therefore, if they be payable on demand they bear the stamp duty of 1*d.*, which may be denoted by an adhesive stamp (e). If payable otherwise, they must be stamped beforehand with an ad valorem stamp.

Their definition, requisites, and form.

Date.—A bill is not invalid because it is not dated (f). The date of a bill, acceptance, or indorsement, is presumed, until the contrary be proved, to be the true date (g). The holder of a bill, expressed to be payable at a fixed period after date, and issued undated, or of a bill payable at a fixed period after sight, with the acceptance undated, may insert the true date of the issue or acceptance (h). If the holder in good faith and by mistake inserts a wrong date (i), and in every case where a wrong date is inserted, if the bill subsequently comes into the hands of a holder in due course, the bill is payable as if the date so inserted had been the true date (j).

Time for Payment.—When the word "month" is used in specifying the time of payment, it is, as in other mercantile contracts, to be understood as a calendar month (k). The time for payment is generally expressed to be on demand, or at sight, or a certain time after sight, or a certain time after date. The effect of these and other words in regulating the time at which the instrument should be presented for payment will be discussed hereafter, when we come to treat, in the fifth section, on presentments. If no time of payment be specified, the instrument is payable upon demand (l). The rule as to computing time of payment, in case of a bill not payable on demand, is as follows:—

"(1.) Three days, called days of grace, are, in every case where the bill itself does not otherwise provide, added to the time of payment as fixed by the bill, and the bill is due and payable on the last day of grace. Provided that (a) When the last day of grace falls on Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday, or a day appointed by royal proclamation as a public fast, or thanksgiving day, the bill is, except in the case hereinafter provided for, due and payable on the preceding business day. (b) When the last day of grace is a bank holiday (other than Christmas Day or Good Friday) under the Bank Holidays Act, 1871, and Acts amending or extending it, or when the last day of grace is a Sunday, and the second day of grace is a bank holiday, the bill is due and payable on the succeeding business day (m).

"(2.) Where a bill is payable at a fixed period after date, after sight, or after the happening of a specified event, the time of payment is determined by excluding the day from which the time is to begin to run, and by including the day of payment (n).

"(3.) Where a bill is payable at a fixed period after sight, the time begins to run from the date of the acceptance, if the bill be accepted, and from the date of noting or protest if the bill be noted or protested for non-acceptance, or for non-delivery" (o).

Place of Payment.—Although, in the forms above given, no particular place of payment is specified, and the omission does not invalidate the bill (sect. 3 (4) (c)), the drawee may, if he think proper, specify one; and if he does so a presentment must be made at the place mentioned in order to charge him or an indorser with the acceptor's default (p). Where no place of payment is specified, but the address of the drawee or acceptor is given in the bill, the bill must be there presented (q). Where no place of payment is specified, and no address given, the bill must be presented at the drawee's or acceptor's place of business, if known, or, if not, at his ordinary residence, if known (r).

In any other case it is properly presented to the drawee or acceptor wherever he can be found, or if presented at his last known place of business or residence (s). The same rule holds good of a note, which in the body of it is made payable at a particular place; presentment at that place is necessary to make an indorser liable. It is otherwise when a place of payment is indicated by way of memorandum only; presentment at that place will render the indorser liable, but presentment to the maker elsewhere, if sufficient in other respects, will suffice (t).

Designation of Drawee and Payee.—The drawee and payee must be named, or otherwise indicated with reasonable certainty (t). A bill or note may be drawn payable to a particular individual, or to a particular individual or his order, or generally to the bearer. Formerly, if an instrument were made payable to an individual without further words, it was not negotiable. But now a bill expressed to be payable to a specified individual is payable to him or his order, in the absence of the words indicating an intention that it should not be transferable (u). If it be so payable to an individual, he may transfer his right to a third party by indorsing his name upon it (v); if to bearer generally, or to a specified individual or bearer, it may be transferred by mere delivery; and in the last case it matters not, though the individual named never existed, and could not possibly exist. Thus a draft payable to the ship Fortune or bearer is negotiable by delivery (x). Where the bill is not payable to bearer, the payee must be named or otherwise indicated therein with reasonable certainty (y). If payable to a fictitious person or non-existing person (z) or his order, although no order can be made by the payee who is not in existence, yet if the instrument be issued into the world with an indorsement in blank (the nature of which will presently be explained), purporting to be made by such fictitious or non-existing person, it will, as against the drawer or maker, be considered payable to bearer; and so will a bill drawn in a fictitious name, as against an acceptor, who is precluded from denying the existence of the drawer (a). sub-sect. 3, which re-enacts the common law, Bowen, L. J., said:— Their definition, requisites, and form.

"If the drawer is the person against whom the bill is to be treated as a bill payable to bearer, the term fictitious may be satisfied if it is fictitious as regards himself—or, in other words, fictitious to his knowledge. If the obligations of the acceptor are in question, and the acceptor is the person against whom the bill is to be so treated, fictitious must mean fictitious as regards the acceptor, and to his knowledge" (b).

A bill or note may be made payable to two or more payees jointly, or, in the alternative, to one of two or one or some of several payees, or to the holder of an office for the time being (c). A note may be made payable to the trustees acting under A.'s will, and parol evidence will be admissible to show who they are, and what the trusts are (d); and the same law applies to the case of a bill or note payable to the manager of a bank (e), or other person designated in like manner (f).

When a bill of exchange is wanting in any material particular—for example, when the drawer has not inserted the amount, or when the name of the payee is not inserted—the holder has, primâ facie, an authority to fill up the blank; in the former case he may insert any amount which the stamp will cover (g).

In Montague v. Perkins (h) the acceptor was held liable to an indorsee on a blank acceptance filled up after the lapse of twelve years. Though the possessor of a bill defective in any material particular has a primâ facie authority to fill up the omission any way he thinks fit, this must be done within a reasonable time (for this purpose a question of fact) and strictly in accordance with the authority given. The name may be inserted after the death of the acceptor; the authority to do so is not withdrawn by death (i). If negotiated to a holder in due course, such an instrument in his hand is effectual for all purposes. The blank stamped paper must be delivered for the purpose of being made a bill; delivered for any other purpose, or stolen or lost, such a paper, even if filled up, will be of no effect (k). In Baxendale v. Bennett (kk) the defendant gave his blank acceptance on a stamped paper, and authorized H. to fill in his name as drawer. H. returned the blank acceptance to the defendant in the same state as he received it. The defendant put it into a drawer of a writing table, which was unlocked. The bill was lost or stolen, and C. afterwards, without the defendant's authority, filled in his own name. An action on the bill was brought by the plaintiff as indorsee for value. It was held that the defendant was not liable on the bill on the ground, as stated by Bramwell, L. J., that the defendant was not estopped from setting up the true facts, and that if he had been guilty of negligence, it was not the proximate or effective cause of the fraud. Lord Justice Brett arrived at the same conclusion on the ground that after the acceptance by H. the defendant had never authorized any one to fill in a drawer's name, and that he had never issued the acceptance intending it to be used.

A bill may be drawn payable to the drawer himself; and such an instrument may be treated as a bill of exchange or note (l). And an instrument will not be less a bill, because, instead of being addressed to a particular person, it is addressed to a particular house, at least as far as the person who accepts it is concerned (m), nor because the word at is prefixed to the drawee's name (n); but, as has been already stated, the drawee must be named or otherwise indicated in the bill with reasonable certainty (o). If a person be so designated, he is the only person who can be made liable as acceptor, unless it be for honour (p). It is not, however, necessary that he should sign in the same name; and, therefore, if his wife or an agent, authorized so to accept, should sign her or his own name, this, it is said, will bind the drawee (q).

Name of Maker or Drawer.—The name of the maker or drawer must be inserted or subscribed by himself or his agent (r). As there must be no uncertainty about the payee, so neither must there be about the maker or drawer. Thus a note must not be signed A. B. or else C. B. (s). The name of the drawer may be inscribed before it is certain what will be the exact form of the instrument.

A bill or note is deemed to have been made on behalf of a registered joint stock company if it be made in its name (t) by any person acting under its authority, or if it be made by or on behalf or on account of the company by any person acting under its authority. This section confers no power to issue bills of exchange on companies which have no capacity to do so; it merely regulates the mode in which companies having such capacity become liable (u).

On the other hand, "accepted on behalf of the company" (Harold v. Connor, 34 L. T. N. S. 885), was held to make the acceptor personally liable, where the bill was directed to him. Their definition, requisites, and form.

The following is the form of a foreign bill of exchange :—

For Rs. 550.

At sixty days after sight of this first of Exchange (second and third unpaid) pay to the order of Messrs. ——, Five Hundred and Fifty Rupees, value received of them, and place the same to account.

James Hood.

To ——, Calcutta.

Foreign bills are usually drawn in sets, that is, copies of the bill are made on separate pieces of paper, each part containing a condition that it shall continue payable only so long as the others remain unpaid, a method which considerably diminishes the chances of losing the bill. The holder whose title first accrues is deemed the true owner of the bill (z).

Section II.—Parties to a Bill or Note.

Sect. 22 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, enacts :—

"Capacity to incur liability as a party to a bill is co-extensive with capacity to contract."

The incapacity of one or more of the parties to a bill of exchange does not diminish the liability of the other parties to it (a).

Though an infant may be an agent to indorse, he incurs no liability by drawing, indorsing, or accepting a bill, even, it is said, though given for necessaries (b); though in that case he may be liable on the consideration (c).

At common law, a married woman incurred no liability by drawing or accepting a bill (d), unless she was a trader in the city of London, or her husband was under a civil incapacity of residing here (e). But in equity a feme covert who had separate estate was liable to its extent by drawing, accepting, or indorsing a bill or note (f). A married woman who was divorced or judicially separated from her husband became capable of being a party to a bill (g). Now, by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, a married woman, married either before or after the Act, can be sued on a bill as if she were a single woman (h). But judgment can be enforced only against her separate estate, if any. A married woman, as agent for her husband, may indorse a note payable to her in her own name (i). The effect of bills or notes to which agents, mercantile corporations, or firms, are parties, has already been discussed in the First Book under their respective heads.

It will be proper in this place to mention some peculiar rules respecting banking corporations and partnerships, who, together with bankers carrying on business individually, have been the objects of certain special legislative enactments.

There are three classes of banks existing in England—

1. The Bank of England.
2. Banks of six, or fewer than six persons.
3. Banking corporations, and companies of more than six persons.

Nothing in the Bills of Exchange Act affects the provisions of the Act relating to joint-stock banks or companies, or any Act relating to or confirming the privileges of the Bank of England or the Bank of Ireland (sect. 97).

1. The Bank of England (k), which is a corporation (l), can issue bills or notes unstamped, with the exclusive privilege of doing so within three miles of London (m), and may re-issue its notes after payment thereof ad libitum without being liable to any stamp duty (n). Its notes, payable to bearer on demand, are, like cash, a legal tender except by the Bank itself or its branches (o); but if issued out of London, they must be made payable where issued (p); they are not legal tender in Ireland or Scotland (q).

2. Banks of six, or fewer than six persons, who on the 6th of May, 1844, were carrying on the business of a banker in England or Wales, having obtained a licence and given security by bond, may, except within the city of London or three miles thereof, issue on unstamped paper promissory notes for five pounds or upwards, payable to bearer on demand, or to order, at any period not exceeding seven days after sight; and also draw and issue on unstamped paper bills of exchange, payable to order on demand, or any period not exceeding seven days after sight or twenty-one days after date: provided such bills of exchange be drawn on a bank in London, Westminster, or

(k) The history of the Bank of England and of its exclusive privileges, which are now chiefly regulated by 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 98, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 32, is given, and the statutes creating them set out at large, in Bank of England v. Anderson, 3 Bing. N. C. 589. Mr. Walker (Treatise on Banking Law, 2nd edit. p. 11) divides banks of deposit into the following thirteen classes: (1) banks formed under 7 Geo. 4, c. 46; (2) such banks as reconstituted under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 113; (3) banks formed under 7 Geo. 4, c. 46, and registered under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 49; (4) banks formed under 7 Geo. 4, c. 46, and registered under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89; (5) banks formed under 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 98; (6) banks formed under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 73, and 47 & 48 Vict. c. 56; (7) banks formed under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 113, and registered under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 49, or under 21 & 22 Vict. c. 91; (8) banks formed and registered under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 49, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 91; (9) banks formed under the Companies Act, 1862; (10) banks registered as unlimited under the Companies Act, 1862, and registered as limited under 42 & 43 Vict. c. 76, and limited companies registered under 42 & 43 Vict. c. 76; (11) private banks composed of any number of persons not exceeding ten; (12) trustees' savings banks; (13) Post Office savings banks.

Southwark, or by bankers at a town or place where they are licensed to issue unstamped notes and bills upon themselves, or their copartners, payable at any other town or place where those bankers shall also be licensed to issue such notes and bills (r).

3. Banking (s) corporations and companies of more than six persons are forbidden to issue in London, or within sixty-five miles of London, any bill or note for the payment of money on demand, or upon which any person holding it may obtain payment on demand; or to borrow, owe or take up any sum on their notes, payable upon demand or at any less time than six months from the borrowing thereof, during the continuance of the exclusive privileges of the Bank of England; but if they carry on business in or within sixty-five miles of London, they may draw, accept, or indorse bills of exchange, provided they be not payable to the bearer on demand (t). Such a body, however, having an establishment more than sixty-five miles from London, provided it carried on the business of banking and issued notes on the 6th of May, 1844, may, subject to the restrictions presently specified, issue bills or notes payable on demand or otherwise at the place where they are issued and also at London (u), and have an agent in London or any other place where they shall be made payable for the purpose of such payment only. But such a bill or note must not be for less than five pounds, or re-issued in or within sixty-five miles of London.

Even beyond this distance of sixty-five miles such a corporation or company can only issue such bills or notes subject to the regulations prescribed by stat. 7 Geo. 4, c. 46, which directs that their bills and notes shall be made payable at some place or places specified thereon, exceeding the limited distance (subject, however, to the licence given by 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 98, s. 2; 3 &

The account sets forth the true name of the body, and of every bank established by them, and the names and abodes of two members resident in England, who have been appointed public officers of the corporation or partnership. A further account is also to be delivered within the year, if there be any change in the officers or members.

The co-partnership, unless it be incorporated, must sue and be sued (z) in the name of one of these officers, of whose appointment (though it may be otherwise proved (a)) a copy of the account certified by one of the Commissioners of Stamps is evidence; this copy also proves that all persons named therein were members at the period of its date (b). A decree or judgment against a public officer binds the co-partnership, and execution may be taken out against any member for the time being, and if that proves ineffectual (c), against any person who was a member at the time of the contract, or became a member before it was executed, or was a member at the time of judgment obtained.

These remedies are now, however, practically superseded by proceedings to wind up the company, under which the Court will restrain any process against members (d). The right of suing and being sued by their own members through the medium of their public officer is extended to them by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 96, and members are prohibited from setting off their shares in any such suit.

The issue of bank notes or bills, whether by banks of many or few partners, is now subject to restrictions imposed by the present Bank Charter Act (e), which provides (f) that no person, other than a banker who on May 6th, 1844, was lawfully issuing his own bank notes, shall make or issue them in the United Kingdom, and that

"It shall not be lawful for any banker to draw, accept, make, or issue in England or Wales any bill of exchange, or promissory note, or engagement for the payment of money payable to bearer on demand, or to borrow, owe, or take up in England or Wales any sums or sum of money on the bills or notes of such banker payable to bearer on demand" (g):

Except that any banker, who was on May 6th, 1844, lawfully issuing his own bank notes under the authority of a licence, may continue such issue, but only to the extent and under the conditions presently mentioned. It declares that the right of any company or partnership to continue the issue shall not be prejudiced by any change in the personal composition of the body, either by transfer of shares, or the admission of any new partner, or the retirement of any member (gg): Provided that any company or partnership, then consisting of only six or less than six persons, shall not issue such notes after the number of partners exceeds six. If a banker becomes bankrupt, or ceases to carry on business (h), or discontinues the issue of bank notes, he may not afterwards issue them (i). Every banker (j) who claimed the right of issuing such notes was required to give notice of his claim to the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, who were to ascertain whether he was, on the 6th May, 1844, a banker lawfully issuing his own notes, and if he were, to ascertain the average amount of the bank notes of such banker, or of united banks (k), in circulation during twelve weeks preceding April 12th, 1844, and to certify and publish in the "Gazette" the amount thus ascertained (l). The statute then declares that such banker shall not have in circulation upon the average of four weeks (for the ascertainment of which there are special provisions (m)), a greater amount of notes than the amount so certified. A bank exceeding this limit forfeits a sum equal to the excess (n); but in the event of two banks, each of which consists of not more than six members, uniting, the commissioners may make a fresh certificate of the aggregate of the amounts they were entitled to issue, and the united body may then issue notes to the extent thus certified (o).

No limited bank having a note issue is entitled to limited liability in respect of its notes. The Companies Act, 1879 (p), repeals sect. 182 of the Companies Act, 1862, and in place thereof enacts that:—

"A bank of issue registered as a limited company, either before or after the passing of this Act, shall not be entitled to limited liability in respect of its notes; and the members thereof shall continue liable in respect of its notes in the same manner as if it had been registered as an unlimited company; but in case the general assets of the company are, in the event of the company being wound up, insufficient to satisfy the claims of both the note-holders and the general creditors, then the members, after satisfying the remaining demands of the note-holders, shall be liable to contribute towards payment of the debts of the general creditors a sum equal to the amount received by the note-holders out of the general assets of the company."

registered under the Companies Act, 1862, unless they procure an Act of Parliament or a charter. Being so registered, they become corporations, and the remedies on their bills or notes must be against the body and its funds, and if these fail, the only resource is an application to wind them up (p). The mode in which these latter bodies may be bound by their negotiable instruments is provided by that statute, which enacts (q), that "A promissory note or bill of exchange shall be deemed to have been made, accepted or indorsed on behalf of any company under this Act, if made, accepted or indorsed in the name of the company by any person acting under the authority of the company, or if made, accepted or indorsed by, or on behalf, or on account of the company, by any person acting under the authority of the company."

Nothing in the Bills of Exchange Act affects the Joint Stock Companies Act (r).

When several persons who are not in partnership accept a bill, or make a promissory note, the question whether they are bound jointly, or jointly and severally, depends upon the wording of the instrument (s). A note beginning with "I promise to pay," and signed by several persons, is deemed joint and several (t). In no case will the signature of one of such makers or drawees, it has been said, bind any person except himself (u). Nor, if such persons be payees, can any one of them transfer the bill or note by his individual indorsement; all must indorse unless one is authorized to indorse for the others (x). A note, however, beginning, "I promise to pay," and signed by one partner for himself and his co-partners, is a joint note, and the partner signing is not severally liable upon it (y); but if it promise jointly and severally to pay, all the members of the partnership will be jointly, and the person signing it individually, bound (z). An executor or administrator becoming a party to a bill or note, given for the debt of the deceased, binds himself personally (a).

Section III.—Negotiation of Bills and Notes.

Negotiation of bills and notes.

Although, by the ordinary rule of law, the benefit of contracts could not be transferred, so as to give the transferee a right to sue at law upon them in his own name (b), yet those arising out of bills and notes, generally speaking, might be so in the manner hereinafter specified. Though it once was doubted whether an English note were transferable abroad, it has long been decided that it is so (c). How a foreign note is transferred will be subsequently explained with reference to sect. 72 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

A bill is negotiated when it is transferred from one person to another in such a manner as to constitute the transferee the holder of the bill (d); and a bill payable to bearer or indorsed in blank is negotiated by delivery (e), that is to say, transfer of possession, actual or constructive, from one person to another (sect. 2). A bill payable to order is negotiated by indorsement completed by delivery (f). The signature of the indorser written or printed on the bill itself without additional words is sufficient indorsement (g). It may be in pencil (h); and the mark of a person who cannot write will suffice (h). Though usually it is on the back, it may be on the face of the bill (i). When indorsements are too many to be written on a bill, a slip of paper called an "allonge" is attached to it; and to prevent fraud, it is usual in placing the first signature on the "allonge" to commence it on the bill itself and finish on the "allonge." An indorsement written on an "allonge" or on a "copy" of a bill issued or negotiated in a country where "copies" are recognized is deemed to be written on the bill itself (j).

There may be a written agreement which qualifies the liability of the drawer or acceptor; and as between the original parties it will be valid, if supported by good consideration (k). It may be shown that no consideration was given for the bill or note, or that the actual consideration was different from that stated (l). Just as it may be shown that a deed was given as an escrow, that is, subject to a condition that it should not operate until a certain event, so it may be shown that a bill was delivered on such a condition. But such an agreement, we have seen, will not, as against a holder in due course, restrain the negotiability of the bill (m).

The indorsement must be an indorsement of the entire bill (n). A partial indorsement will not operate as a negotiation of the bill, though perhaps under such an indorsement the indorsee might have a lien. But if a bill or note be indorsed for part of the sum due on it, and the limitation do not appear on the face of the bill, the indorsee will be able to recover the whole sum from the acceptor or maker, and will be a trustee of the excess for the indorser (o).

A mistake in spelling the name of a person to whom a bill is specially indorsed will not prevent that person from transferring it by the indorsement of his name properly spelt upon it (p).

An indorsement may be either blank, special or restrictive (q). Where a bill purports to be indorsed conditionally, the condition as between indorser and indorsee, would, it is presumed, be operative; and if the money were paid to the indorsee without the fulfilment of the condition, he would hold it in trust for the indorser. But the condition may, as has been already stated, be disregarded by the payer (r). The following are instances of conditional indorsements:—"Pay A. B., or order on the arrival of the ship Tanjore at Bombay," or "pay C. D. or order if he marries X."

An indorsement in blank specifies no indorsee. A bill so indorsed is payable to bearer (s). An indorsement may be made either by simply writing the signature of the indorser on the bill, or by writing above the signature the words "pay to, or order," or "pay to, or bearer."

A special indorsement specifies the person to whom, or to whose order, the bill is to be payable (t). It runs "pay to A. B. or order," or "pay to A. B.'s order." Such a bill is payable only to the particular person mentioned or his order. The indorsee must be named or indicated with reasonable certainty; but the bill may be specially indorsed to two or more indorsees jointly, or in the alternative to one or two, or one or some of several indorsees (u). Any indorsement in blank may be converted into a special indorsement (v). A blank indorsement may be converted into a special indorsement by writing above the indorser's signature a direction to pay the bill to, or to the order of, himself or some other person.

A restrictive indorsement prohibits the further negotiation of the bill, or expresses that it is a mere authority to deal with the bill as thereby directed, and not a transfer of the ownership thereof; for example, a bill may be indorsed "pay D. only," or "pay D. for the account of B.," or "pay D., or order for collection" (x). "Pay J. Spittal, or order, value in amount with H. C. Drinkwater," was held not to be a restrictive indorsement (y).

Negotiation of bills and notes.

An indorsement in full to A. without the word "only" will not deprive A. of the power of indorsing. A restrictive indorsement gives the indorsee the right to receive payment of the bill, and to sue any party thereto whom his indorser could have sued; it confers no power to transfer his rights as indorsee, unless it expressly authorise him to do so (z).

Indorsements are deemed, until the contrary is proved, to have been made in the order in which they appear on the bill (a).

A person who transfers a bill without indorsing it is called a "transferor by delivery," and is not liable on the bill. But he warrants, to the immediate transferee if a holder for value, that it is what it purports to be, that he has a right to transfer it, and that he is not aware of any fact which makes it valueless (b). If the bill be a forgery, or if the transferor by delivery has stolen, or found the bill, he will be liable on it to his immediate transferee; in such cases the bill is not what it purports to be.

If such a transfer were by way of payment of a former debt, that debt will not be looked upon as satisfied, unless the bill or note be discharged, or the holder be guilty of laches, when it comes to maturity (c).

Such is the mode of negotiating or transferring a bill or note, which transfer may, in general, be made by any holder (d) or his legal representative; as, if the holder die, by his executors or administrators (e); if he become bankrupt, by his trustee, unless

The transfer by delivery of a note payable to bearer does not imply a warranty that the maker of the note is solvent at the time of such delivery; it is only a warranty to the transferor that he is not aware of the insolvency of the parties to it. under particular circumstances, as where the bankrupt held the bill in the character of trustee or agent for another person (c). Persons holding bills in autre droit should exercise this power of transfer with much caution, for unless they add words indicating that they sign in a representative character, they will be personally bound by their indorsement (d).

When a bill or note is lost or stolen, a thief or finder can, of course, convey no title in it to any other person, if at the time of the loss it be transferable only by indorsement. But if a bill be transferable by mere delivery, the thief or finder may convey a title in it to any person who took the bill in good faith and for value, and who "at the time the bill was negotiated to him had no notice of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it" (e). If such person take it without good faith, or under circumstances which must have led him to suspect the true state of the case, and subject him to the imputation of such gross negligence as satisfies the jury of fraud, he will not be allowed to retain it, even though he have given its full value (f). Gross negligence will, however, not be regarded as equivalent to fraud (g).

As to the time at which a bill or note may be negotiated, it may be so until it has been restrictively indorsed or discharged, by payment or otherwise (h). But a person who takes (i) a bill after it is due, or with notice of its having been dishonoured by non-acceptance, takes it subject to any defects of title affecting it at its maturity (j). The expression "defect of title" is used in the Act instead of the phrase once common, "equity attaching to the bill" (k). "After a bill or note is due, it comes disgraced to the indorsee, and it is his duty to make inquiries concerning it." He takes it subject to all the equities with which it may be incumbered. Thus, if the holder took it from a thief or finder, he cannot recover on it, inasmuch as the thief or finder could not (l).

A bill payable on demand is deemed to be overdue when it appears on the face of it to have been in circulation for an unreasonable length of time, which for this purpose is a question of fact (m). A bill accepted or indorsed when it is overdue, will, as regards the acceptor or any indorser, be deemed a bill payable on demand (n). A person taking a cheque—that is, a bill of exchange, drawn on a bank and payable on demand—does so at his peril, if it appears to have been in circulation for an unreasonable time (o). A different rule applies to promissory notes payable on demand when negotiated. They are not deemed to be overdue for the purposes of affecting a holder with defects of title of which he had no notice, by reason of a reasonable time for presenting it for payment having elapsed since its issue (p). But a note payable on demand which has been indorsed must be presented for payment within a reasonable time of the indorsement (q).

A title is defective when the person who negotiates the bill obtained it or the acceptance by fraud, duress, or force and fear, or other unlawful means, or for an illegal consideration, or when he negotiates it in breach of faith, or under such circumstances as amount to a fraud (q). The circumstance that the bill was an accommodation bill, or that there was a set-off, would not be such a defect. These equities, or defects in title, as they are called in the Bills of Exchange Act, must be such as naturally arise out of the bill or note transaction, not out of some collateral matter, as, for instance, a right of set-off, which the maker or acceptor would have had against the party who transferred it to the holder (r).

Though a bill or note is, generally speaking, negotiable after it has become due, yet it is not so after it has once been paid at maturity, if such negotiation would have the effect of charging persons who otherwise would be discharged (s). An indorser who pays a bill may, by s. 59, further negotiate the bill (t). He is not, however, entitled to enforce payment of the bill against any intervening party to whom he was previously liable (u). An acceptor cannot re-issue a bill of which, at or after its maturity, he is the "holder in his own right"; for it is then discharged (x). The common law seems to be partly altered. It was held before the Act that, if the acceptor of a bill became the executor of the holder, the bill was discharged (y). If a bill be paid at maturity, that payment will discharge the parties to it, even though their names should be left on the bill by accident and it should subsequently be negotiated (z). But if it be paid before it arrives at maturity, the person so paying or receiving payment must run the risk, if he allow his name to remain on it, of being subsequently called on by a bonâ fide holder, should it get into the hands of such a person. "Nothing," to use the words of Parke, B., "will discharge the acceptor or the drawer except payment according to the law merchant, that is, payment of the bill at maturity. If a party pays it before, he purchases it, and is in the same situation as if he had discounted it" (a).

Lastly. It is to be observed, on the subject of transfer, that the indorser of a bill by indorsing it—

"(a) Engages that on due presentment it shall be accepted and paid according to its tenor, and that if it be dishonoured he will compensate the holder or a subsequent indorser who is compelled to pay it, provided that the requisite proceedings on dishonour be duly taken;

"(b) Is precluded from denying to a holder in due course the genuineness and regularity in all respects of the drawer's signature and all previous indorsements;

"(c) Is precluded from denying to his immediate or a subsequent indorsee that the bill was at the time of its indorsement a valid and subsisting bill, and that he had then a good title thereto (b)."

The drawer of a bill and an indorser may, by express stipulations, negative or limit his own liability to the holder, or waive, as regards himself, some or all of the holder's duties (c). This is sometimes done by the drawer or indorser adding to his signature the words "without recourse, or sans recours." This prevents the suing of the drawer or indorser, as the case may be. It does not affect a holder's right to sue any other party to the bill.

Section IV.—Acceptance.

Acceptance.

Acceptance is "the signification by the drawee of his assent to the order of the drawer" (g). An acceptance must be expressed by writing on the bill, and must, according to the present law, be signed by the drawee (h). It must be for the payment of money; if it were for the delivery of negotiable paper, or anything except money, it would be invalid (i).

A bill may be accepted before it has been signed by the drawer, or while otherwise incomplete (j). The acceptor of a bill overdue will be liable to pay on demand (k). No particular form of words is necessary to make an acceptance by the drawee; the mere signature of the drawee without additional words being sufficient (l).

An acceptance may be either general or qualified, or, as the distinction is sometimes expressed, absolute or conditional (m). A general acceptance assents, without qualification, to the order of the drawer (n); a qualified acceptance in express terms varies the effect of the bill as drawn. Thus it may be (o) conditional, that is to say, payment by the acceptor may be made dependent on the fulfilment of a stated condition, e.g., "accepted when in cash for the cargo of the ship Thetis." It has been held that an acceptance may be rendered conditional by another contemporaneous writing (p), though not as against a bonâ fide holder ignorant of the existence of such writing. Its terms cannot be varied by any contemporaneous parol agreement, since that would be against the first principles of the laws of evidence (q). There may be an acceptance to pay part only of the amount for which the bill is drawn, or an acceptance to pay only at a particular specified place, or an acceptance of some one or more, but not all, of the drawees (r). It may be qualified as to time (s), e.g., accepted on condition of being renewed till November 28, 1844 (t). An acceptance to pay at a particular place is a general acceptance (u), unless it expressly states that the bill is to be paid there only, and not elsewhere. Thus an acceptance "payable at Coutt's Bank" would be general, and would not require presentment to that bank for payment. On the other hand, an acceptance "payable at Coutt's Bank only" would be qualified.

A holder of a bill has a right to require an unqualified acceptance (x), conformable to the tender of the order specifying, if none be mentioned, a place of payment, and mentioning the time of presentment, if payable after sight. But if the holder thinks fit to accept any such acceptance, he will be bound by it.

Acceptance of a bill is incomplete and revocable until delivery of the instrument (y). The acceptor engages that he will pay the bill according to the tenor of his acceptance (z). Against a holder in due course he may not deny the existence of the drawer, or the genuineness of his signature (a); an acceptor, it was said, was bound to know the handwriting of the drawer. Thus he may not prove that the signature is a forgery. He also admits the drawer's capacity and authority to draw (b), e. g., in the case of an agent, he is estopped from proving that the agent was not authorised to draw (c). In the case of a bill payable to the drawer's order, the acceptor may not deny the capacity of the drawer to indorse, but may deny the genuineness or validity of the indorsement (d), and the same rule holds good in the case of a bill payable to the order of a third person (e).

The drawer of a bill, and any indorser of it, may insert therein the name of the person to whom the holder may resort in case of need, that is to say, in case the bill is dishonoured by non-acceptance or non-payment (f). Such person is called in the Act "the referee in case of need." If acceptance is refused by this "referee," notice of dishonour is not necessary in order to preserve the holder's right of recourse against the person giving the address of the referee in case of need. A dishonoured bill containing the name of a referee in case of need must be protested for non-payment before it is presented for payment to the referee (g).

There is a peculiar kind of acceptance called acceptance for honour supra protest (h). It is adopted when, in order to promote the negotiation of the bill, or save the credit of the drawer or some other party thereto, in a case where the drawee is not to be found, or cannot, or will not, accept, or, after he has accepted, absconds, or becomes bankrupt, a stranger thinks fit to accept the bill for the honour of some one of the parties thereto. This acceptance will enure to the benefit of all the parties subsequent to him for whose honour it was made (i), and whose name it generally specifies; if it do not, it is considered to be for the honour of the drawer (k). A bill accepted for the honour of some one of the parties to it, may be again accepted for the honour of another (l). But in no case is the holder obliged to take an acceptance for honour (m).

Acceptance.

An acceptance for honour supra protest must be written on the bill and indicate that it is an acceptance for honour (n). It must be signed by the acceptor for honour; e. g., "accepted for the honour of A. B., supra protest," or "accepts, s. p." Such an acceptor engages that he will, on due presentment, pay the bill according to the tenor of his acceptance, if it is not paid by the drawee, provided it has been duly presented for payment and protested for non-payment, and that he receives notice of these facts (o). He is liable to the holder, and to all parties to the bill subsequent to the party for whose honour he has accepted (p). The engagement of an acceptor for honour differs from that of an ordinary acceptor; it is conditional on due presentment, and notice of dishonour, and protest of the bill. It is equivalent to saying to the holder, "Keep the bill, do not return it; and when the time arrives at which it ought to be paid, if it be not paid by the party on whom it is drawn, come to me, and you shall have the money." In order, therefore, to complete the liability of the acceptor for honour, the bill must be presented for payment when it falls due, notwithstanding the former refusal of the drawee, who may possibly in the meantime have received assets (q). This presentment (r) must be followed by protest of the bill for non-payment before it is presented for payment to the acceptor for honour or referee in case of need (s).

Formerly, it was necessary that an acceptance for honour should be made in the presence of a notary, and that an act of honour should be executed. The Act expressly states that payment for honour supra protest, in order to operate as such, and not as a mere voluntary payment, must be attested by "a notarial act of honour" (t). When dishonoured by an acceptor for honour, a bill of exchange must, notwithstanding the option given by s. 51, be protested for nonpayment (u). The payee for honour succeeds to the rights and duties of the holder as regards the party for whose honour he pays, and all parties liable to him (v).

There is another kind of acceptance. A person who accepts a bill without receiving value for so doing, and for the purpose of lending his name, is called an accommodation acceptor (x). He is liable on the bill to a holder for value, whether or not the latter in taking the bill knew the acceptor to be an accommodation acceptor (y). The person accommodating may be the acceptor, drawer, or indorser. The rights inter se of the parties to such a bill will be regulated by the real nature of the transaction between them, and not by the order of their names on the bill. Primâ facie, however, they will be entitled to relief as if the bill had been drawn and indorsed for value. In the case of an accommodation bill the drawer, in the absence of any express agreement to the contrary, engages that he will provide funds for the payment of the bill at maturity, and that, if owing to his failing to do so the acceptor is compelled to pay the bill, he will indemnify him (z).

There cannot be a second acceptance of a bill of exchange. If such be written on a bill it may be evidence of a collateral undertaking (a). All the numbered parts of a set, when a bill is so drawn, are regarded as one bill (b). But if the drawee accepts more than one part of a bill drawn in sets, he is liable on every part to holders in due course as if it were a separate bill (c).

Section V.—Presentment.

Presentment.

There are two kinds of presentment—presentment for acceptance, and presentment for payment. Every holder of a bill ought to present it in due time for acceptance, if necessary, and in all cases for payment, and to give notice, if it be dishonoured, to every person who would be entitled to bring an action on it after paying it. If he fails in any of these particulars, such parties will be discharged. In some cases the debt for which the bill or cheque was given, though that of a third person, may be discharged; e. g., if C., the creditor, takes from D., his debtor, the cheque of an agent of D., and does not present it within a reasonable time, so as to prejudice the position of D., he is discharged (d). Presentment.

First, as to presentment for acceptance. It is prudent in all cases, since the holder, if he succeeds in obtaining it, gains the additional security of the drawee, while if he fails, his remedy against the drawer is accelerated. But it is necessary only in three cases to make parties to a bill liable: where a bill is payable after sight (e), or it expressly stipulates for presentment, or it is drawn payable elsewhere than at the residence or place of business of the drawee (f). In no other case is presentment necessary.

When a bill has been presented for acceptance and dishonoured, notice of dishonour must be at once given to the parties whom it is intended to charge, and the Statute of Limitations runs from that date (g).

The Bills of Exchange Act contains certain rules, for the most part declaratory of the common law, as to presentment (h). First, as to presentment for acceptance:—

"(a) The presentment must be made by or on behalf of the holder to the drawee or to some person authorised to accept or refuse acceptance on his behalf (i), at a reasonable hour on a business day (k), and before the bill is overdue."

The holder of a bill payable after sight must either present it for acceptance or negotiate it within a reasonable time, otherwise the drawer and all indorsers prior to the holder will be discharged (l). What is such reasonable time is to be determined by the nature of the bill, the usage of trade as to similar bills, and the facts of the particular case (m). No delay warranted by the ordinary course of business is unreasonable; and therefore bills drawn by a country banker upon London may, by the course of dealing, be retainable, as part of the circulating medium of the country, for a longer period than they would be if drawn under other circumstances (n). So with respect to bills payable abroad after sight, in the absence of any positive regulation, general usage, or particular course of trade, the rule is, that they must be forwarded to their destination for acceptance within a reasonable time; what is that reasonable time is a mixed question of law and fact, to be decided by a judge or a jury, acting under the direction of a judge, on the particular circumstances of each case, and they, in order to arrive at its determination, should not take into their consideration the situation and interests of the drawer only, or of the holder only, but of both. Where a jury were directed to act thus, and held a delay of four months and twenty-one days not unreasonable, their decision has been approved of (o), though the bill was not circulated during that time. If the bill be circulated during the interval, greater indulgence is allowed; and in one case Buller, J., said, that if a bill at three days' sight were kept out in that way for a year, he could not say there would be laches (p). But if there be a wanton or careless detainer by the holder, even of such a bill, the other parties are discharged (q). On a presentment for acceptance, the bill must, it seems, be left with the drawee twenty-four hours, unless he, in the interim, either accept or refuse to do so (r). Presentment.

"(b) Where a bill is addressed to two or more drawees, who are not partners, presentment must be made to them all, unless one has authority to accept for all then presentment may be made to him only (s):

"(c) Where the drawee is dead presentment may be made to his personal representative (t):

"(d) Where the drawee is bankrupt presentment may be made to him or to his trustee (u):

"(e) Where authorized by agreement or usage, a presentment through the post office is sufficient (v)."

Presentment is excused where the drawee is dead or bankrupt, or is a fictitious person or one not having capacity to contract, or where after the exercise of reasonable diligence presentment cannot be made (x). But the circumstance that the holder has reason to believe that the bill will not be honoured does not excuse non-presentment (y).

A bill must be presented for payment, otherwise the drawer and indorsers will be discharged (z). It is not necessary to charge the maker or acceptor. The Act contains certain rules for presentment for payment.

"(1.) Where the bill is not payable on demand, presentment must be made on the day it falls due" (a).

A bill or note not payable on demand is not really payable until three days, known as days of grace, after the day fixed by the bill. If the third day be a Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday, or a day appointed by royal proclamation as a public fast or thanksgiving day, the bill is payable on the preceding business day. If the third day is a Bank Holiday, it is payable on the succeeding business day (y). The time of payment of a bill payable at a fixed period after date, after sight, or after the happening of a specified event, is ascertained by excluding the day from which the time is to begin to run, and including the day of payment (z). The due date of a bill drawn in one country and payable in another is determined by the law of the latter country (a).

A foreign bill is frequently drawn payable at so many usances. An usance signifies the time in which, during the infancy of bills, all bills between this country and the place on or at which the instrument is drawn, were payable (b): these usances are calculated exclusively of the day of the date and of the days of grace. Thus, an usance between this country and Venice being three calendar months, a bill drawn on Venice at two usances, and dated on the 1st of January, purports to fall due upon the 1st of July following. But at Venice six days of grace are allowed, excluding Sundays, holidays, and days on which the bank is shut; the bill, therefore, must not be presented till the 7th, and if such a day intervene, not till the 8th.

In computing the time which such bills have to run, it sometimes becomes necessary to divide a month; thus, a bill drawn on Venice at half usance, is payable at one month and a half from date; in such cases the half month means fifteen days (c).

"(2.) Where the bill is payable on demand, then, subject to the provisions of this Act, presentment must be made within a reasonable time after its issue (d) in order to render the drawer liable, and within a reasonable time after its indorsement in order to render the indorser liable. In determining what is a reasonable time regard shall be had to the nature of the bill, the usage of trade with regard to similar bills, and the facts of the particular case" (e).

Presentment.

What is a reasonable time is, in the absence of any settled rule, a mixed question of law and fact, to be decided in the same way as the like question concerning the presentment for acceptance of bills at or after sight (f); and a longer time for presentment will be allowed when the instrument was intended to be a continuing security, or has been circulated, and was apparently meant for circulation (g). But any delay beyond what the common course of business warrants is in ordinary cases unreasonable. If the instrument be payable at a banker's, and in the place where the party receives it, the established rule now is, that it suffices to present it at any time during banking hours on the business day (h) after it is received (i). If it be payable elsewhere, it suffices to forward it by the regular post on the day after it is received (j); and the party receiving it by post has till the next day to present it (k). These limits, however, must not be transgressed (l), save under very special circumstances; as where a servant received the notes on Friday for his master, who was then absent, and did not return till after banking hours on Saturday, and consequently could not present the notes till Monday (m).

In the case of a cheque, any unreasonable delay to present it for payment exonerates the drawer to the extent to which he may have been injured, if the banker or person on whom it was drawn has failed in the interim (n).

"(3.) Presentment must be made by the holder or by some person authorized to receive payment on his behalf at a reasonable hour on a business day (n), at the proper place as hereinafter defined (o), either to the person designated by the bill as payer, or to some person authorized to pay, or refuse payment on his behalf, if with the exercise of reasonable diligence such person can there be found" (p).

If the maker or drawee be absent, or the house at which the bill or note was payable be found shut up, it may be treated as dishonoured (q); but care must be taken that he has absented himself, and not merely removed; nor is his bankruptcy or stopping payment any excuse for the want of presentment (r). The person who presents a bill must be ready and willing to deliver it up on payment (s).

The following are the rules defining a proper place for presentment:—

"(a) Where a place of payment is specified in the bill, and the bill is there presented (t).

"(b) Where no place of payment is specified, but the address of the drawee or acceptor is given in the bill, and the bill is there presented (u).

"(c) Where no place of payment is specified, and no address given (x), and the bill is presented at the drawee's or acceptor's place of business, if known, and if not, at his ordinary residence, if known.

"(d) In any other case, if presented to the drawee or acceptor wherever he can be found (x), or if presented at his last known place of business or residence."

Where a bill is payable at a bankers, a presentment at the bankers is sufficient (y); if at a particular place, where the acceptor has no residence, a presentment, it is said, at all the banking houses in the place (z). Where a particular house is pointed out by the bill as the acceptor's residence, he is bound, if he remove from that house, to leave sufficient funds to meet the bill, and a presentment to any inmate (a), or, if the house be shut up, at the door, will be sufficient (b). By the usage of bankers in London, a bill or cheque held by a bank and payable by another, may be presented at the clearing house (c). If the bill be payable at two alternate places, the holder may present at either (d).

A bill drawn on two or more persons, not partners, must, if no place of payment is specified, be presented to all (e). Presentment for acceptance is dispensed with where the drawee is dead (f). But in the event of the death of the drawee, and if no place of payment be specified, presentment for payment must be made to the personal representatives, if such there be, and they can with reasonable diligence be found (g). As in the case of presentment for acceptance, usage may permit presentment for acceptance by post.

Presentment for payment is unnecessary (h) :—

"(a) Where, after the exercise of reasonable diligence, presentment as required by this Act cannot be effected (i). The fact that the holder has reason to believe that the bill will on presentment be dishonoured, does not dispense with the necessity for presentment (k).

"(b) Where the drawee is a fictitious person (l).

"(c) As regards the drawer, where a drawee or acceptor is not bound, as between himself and the drawer, to accept or pay the bill, and the drawer has no reason to believe that the bill would be paid if presented."

Section VI.—Notice.

Notice.

When a bill or note is dishonoured by non-acceptance or non-payment, notice of such dishonour must be given to the drawer and each indorser to whom the holder wishes to have recourse (o). If the drawer have died, notice must be given to his representatives; if he have become a bankrupt, to his trustee (p). Notice to a person not a party to the bill, but only collaterally liable, as upon a guarantee for its payment, is unnecessary (q). It is no excuse for the omission to give notice that the indorser or drawer has not suffered loss thereby; the law presumes that he is injured, and, except in certain cases, the party to whom it should have been given is discharged from all liability.

Notice of dishonour does not mean mere knowledge, and a party may be entitled to a formal communication of the dishonour of a bill, though it be clearly shown that he knew it would be dishonoured (r).

The notice must conform to certain rules, of which the following are the chief (s):—

"(1.) The notice must be given by or on behalf of the holder, or by or on behalf of an indorser who, at the time of giving it, is himself liable on the bill (t):

(n) Sect. 46 (2).

(r) Burgh v. Legge, 5 M. & W. 418. But if he be the person to whom in truth the bill is presented, formal notice is unnecessary: Caunt v. Thompson, 7 C. B. 400.

(s) Sect. 49.

(t) Chapman v. Keane, 3 Ad. & E. 193; Ex parte Barclay, 7 Ves. 597; Jameson v. Swinton, 2 Taunt. 224; Wilson v. Swabey, infra. See Stewart v. Kennett, 2 Camp. 177. Notice from the acceptor has been held sufficient;

Notice.

"(2.) Notice of dishonour may be given by an agent either in his own name or in the name of any party entitled to give notice, whether that party be his principal or not:

"(3.) Where the notice is given by or on behalf of the holder, it enures for the benefit of all subsequent holders and all prior indorsers who have a right of recourse against the party to whom it is given (u).

"(4.) Where notice is given by or on behalf of an indorser entitled to give notice as hereinbefore provided, it enures for the benefit of the holder, and all indorsers subsequent to the party to whom notice is given."

It does not appear necessary that the person giving notice should have been specifically authorised to do so on behalf of the holder or indorser. Unless, however, he on whose behalf the notice is given be liable on the bill it will not avail. Thus, it will not suffice if he be discharged by his signature being cancelled by having indorsed sans recours, or through the bill not having been duly presented for acceptance. The notice need not state on whose behalf it is given (x). If it purport to do so, and by mistake the name of another party to the bill be mentioned, the notice will not be void. The only effect, it seems, will be to entitle the person to whom it is addressed to avail himself, as against the party on whose behalf it is actually given, of any defence he would have against the party whose named is used (y).

The notice must be given in sufficient time to maintain the action if such party were suing on the bill (a).

"(5.) The notice may be given in writing or by personal communication (g), and may be given in any terms which sufficiently identify the bill and intimate that the bill has been dishonoured by non-acceptance or non-payment (h).

"(6.) The return of a dishonoured bill to the drawer or an indorser is, in point of form, deemed a sufficient notice of dishonour" (hh).

Rules 5 and 6 remove some difficulties as to the sufficiency of notices of dishonour. All that is now necessary is a notice identifying the bill, and intimating that it has been dishonoured by non-acceptance or non-payment. Before the Act the true rule of construction was that where the terms of the notice are such that it appears by reasonable intendment, and would be inferred by any man of business, that the bill has been presented to the acceptor and not paid by him, although it does not appear by express terms or necessary implication, that is sufficient (i). Therefore a notice informing a party that the acceptance due that day was unpaid, accompanied by expressions requesting his attention to it, or requiring payment, was deemed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber to be sufficient. A notice which described a bill as "a note," but in which the date was accurately stated, was sufficient (j).

Whether a person has been misled by a misdescription of a bill in a notice of its dishonour is a question of fact in each particular case. Notice was held good where the defendant, the drawer, was called the "acceptor," and the acceptor was described as the "drawer" (k), and where the notice misstated the bank at

In Bailey v. Porter, 14 M. & W. 44, which was adopted by the Court as the ruling authority, the following notice was held sufficient:—"James Court's acceptance, due this day, is unpaid, and I request your immediate attention to it." Armstrong v. Christiani, 5 C. which the bill was payable, all other particulars being rightly described, and the defendant not being in fact misled. Notice.

"(7.) A written notice need not be signed, and an insufficient written notice may be supplemented and validated by verbal communication. A misdescription of the bill shall not vitiate the notice unless the party to whom the notice is given is in fact misled thereby.

"(8.) Where notice of dishonour is required to be given to any person, it may be given either to the party himself, or to his agent in that behalf" (m).

A referee in case of need is not for the purpose of receiving notice of dishonour an agent of the party inserting his name (n). Where a drawer was one of the partners of a firm by which the bill was accepted, the notice which any one of the partners received of its dishonour was deemed sufficient to bind the drawer (o). Notice to a member of a public company or quasi-corporation is not notice to the company (p). An agent for the purpose of indorsing a bill is deemed to be an agent for the purpose of receiving notice of dishonour, and a notice given him will be good.

"(9.) Where the drawer or indorser is dead, and the party giving notice knows it, the notice must be given to a personal representative if such there be, and with the exercise of reasonable diligence he can be found.

"(10.) Where the drawer or indorser is bankrupt, notice may be given either to the party himself or to his trustee.

"(11.) Where there are two or more drawers or indorsers who are not partners, notice must be given to each of them, unless one of them has authority to receive such notice for the others" (l).

Notice.

His house remained open, and in the possession of a messenger. No notice was given to the drawer or left at his house, or given to the assignees, of whose appointment the holder had notice. In these circumstances the drawer's estate was held to be discharged from the bill (r). In another case the holder of a bill which was dishonoured after the appointment of a trustee in the bankruptcy of the drawer, sent by post notice of the dishonour to the drawer, directed to an address which he had left for some months, the address being the only one with which the holder was acquainted. The notice was held sufficient (s).

"(12.) The notice may be given as soon as the bill is dishonoured, and must be given within a reasonable time thereafter (t).

"In the absence of special circumstances, notice is not deemed to have been given within a reasonable time, unless—(a) where the person giving, and the person to receive notice reside in the same place, the notice is given or sent off in time to reach the latter on the day after the dishonour of the bill; (b) where the person giving, and the person to receive notice reside in different places, the notice is sent off on the day after the dishonour of the bill, if there be a post at a convenient hour on that day, and if there be no such post on that day, then by the next post thereafter" (u).

The holder has his day to give notice to any party he may seek to charge, and each of the prior indorsers in turn has his day; but the holder may avail himself of a notice duly given by any other party to the bill (x). Non-business days, that is, Sunday, Good Friday, Christmas Day, bank holidays, and days appointed by royal proclamation as a public fast or thanksgiving day, are not counted if the period within which the notice should be given is less than three days (y). If a bill is dishonoured on Saturday, it will be sufficient if the notice be sent off so as to be delivered on the Monday, if the persons giving and receiving notice reside in the same place. Where they reside in different places, the notice may be sent off on the Monday if there be a convenient post on that day; if not, the notice must be sent by the next post thereafter.

"(13.) Where a bill, when dishonoured, is in the hands of an agent, he may either himself give notice to the parties liable on the bill, or he may give notice to his principal. If he give notice to his principal, he must do so within the same time as if he were the holder, and the principal upon receipt of such notice has himself the same time for giving notice as if the agent had been an independent holder" (a).

A banker presenting a bill or note for his customer has the same time to give notice to his customer as if the banker were the holder for his own benefit; and the customer has the same time to transmit the notice to former parties as if such had been the case (b). And a person who pays a bill for the honour of an indorser, holds as upon a transfer from him, and has a right to take advantage of any notice of which the person for whom he made the payment could have availed himself (c).

"(14.) Where a party to a bill receives due notice of dishonour, he has, after the receipt of such notice, the same period of time for giving notice to antecedent parties that the holder has after the dishonour (d).

"(15.) Where a notice of dishonour is duly addressed and posted, the sender is deemed to have given due notice of dishonour, notwithstanding any miscarriage by the post office" (e).

In certain cases giving notice will be excused or dispensed with. It is excused when the delay is caused by "circumstances beyond the control of the party giving notice, and not imputable to his default, misconduct, or negligence," as in case of the death or illness of the holder (e), or where the indorser gives a wrong address or misleads the holder as to it, and the notice is consequently long in reaching him (f).

Notice of dishonour is dispensed with—

"(a) When, after the exercise of reasonable diligence, notice as required by this Act cannot be given to, or does not reach the drawer or indorser sought to be charged" (g).

Thus, going to the party's counting-house during business hours and finding no one there to receive the notice, is equivalent to a dispensation with notice; since, according to the usage of trade, a merchant who puts his name to a bill ought to be ready at his place of business to receive notice of its dishonour (h).

"(b) By waiver, express or implied. Notice of dishonour may be waived before the time of giving notice has arrived, or after the omission to give due notice" (i).

In an action by an indorsee against the drawer, a letter in which he said, "You know I meant to call upon you immediately after the 24th with the money; Mr. G. (the acceptor) is an old and intimate friend of mine," was deemed sufficient evidence of waiver of presentment and notice of dishonour (j). In fact, any acknowledgment by a drawer of his liability to pay, or any promise to pay the amount, though conditional as to the mode of payment, is evidence for a jury of due notice of dishonour, and, in the case of a foreign bill, of its having been duly protested (k). According to Woods v. Dean (l), if a person who has not had due notice of dishonour acknowledges, with full knowledge of the facts, his liability, though not to the party then suing, is evidence from which waiver of the notice may be inferred.

"(1) Where drawer and drawee are the same person; (2) where the drawee is a fictitious person, or a person not having capacity to contract; (3) where the drawer is the person to whom the bill is presented for payment; (4) where the drawee or acceptor is as between himself and the drawer under no obligation to accept or pay the bill; (5) where the drawer has countermanded payment" (m).

Of these cases the most important is that of accommodation bills. Before the passing of the Bills of Exchange Act it was held that if a bill was accepted for the accommodation of a drawer, who had not the least reason to expect that it would be paid, he would not be entitled to notice of its dishonour (n), since the reason for notice is that the drawer may, without delay, withdraw his effects from the drawee's hands, which reason, of course, cannot apply when he has none there. But the drawer was entitled to notice, if on taking up the bill he could sue the acceptor or any other party (o), or had reason to expect that the bill would be paid, as if he had effects on their way to the drawee (p), or had effects in the drawee's hands at the time when the bill was drawn (q), or when it was presented for acceptance (r), or afterwards but before it became due (s); in a word, if he had any reasonable ground to expect that the bill will be paid, he was entitled to notice (u). "No case," said Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Orr v. Maginnis (x), "has gone the length of extending the exemption (from the necessity of giving notice) to cases where the drawee had effects of the drawer in his hands at the time of the bill drawn, though the balance might vary afterwards, and be turned into the opposite scale; it would be very dangerous and inconvenient, merely on account of the shifting of a balance, to hold notice not to be necessary." For as regards the indorser notice is dispensed with—

"(1) Where the drawee is a fictitious person or a person not having capacity to contract, and the indorser was aware of the fact at the time he indorsed the bill (y); (2) where the indorser is the person to whom the bill is presented for payment; (3) where the bill was accepted or made for his accommodation" (z).

Immediately upon receiving (a) the notice, the party to whom it is given becomes liable to an action at the suit of the holder, unless the money due upon the bill or note be then paid. It would seem that non-tender is the breach, and that a subsequent tender would not avail.

A foreign bill dishonoured by non-acceptance or non-payment must be protested (b), it is said, and information of the protest sent with the notice (c). It was once thought that a copy of the protest must be sent, unless, indeed, in the case of a person who, having drawn or indorsed a bill abroad, came to this country and received the notice here (d). But it is now settled that it is sufficient to send information that the bill has been protested, without any copy of the protest (e). Inland bills require no protest, but are usually noted for non-payment, a ceremony which is, however, quite unnecessary (f). When a bill is noted or protested, it must be noted on the day of its dishonour—a point which had not hitherto been settled (g).

A protest is a minute of the non-acceptance or non-payment, accompanied by a solemn declaration on the part of the holder against any loss to be sustained thereby (h). It is made out by a notary public, who, at a seasonable hour in the course of the same day in which the bill has been dishonoured, again presents or causes it to be presented, and, if payment be again refused, makes a minute, consisting of his initials, the day, month and year, and reason, if assigned, of non-payment. This minute, the making of which is termed noting the bill, is a mere memorandum, from which the notary may afterwards draw up a protest at his leisure (i), but, per se, it is of no legal effect (k). The protest must contain a copy of the bill; it must be signed by the notary; and it must specify the person at whose request the bill is protested, the place and date of protest, the cause or reason for protesting the bill, the demand made, and the answer given, or the fact that the drawee or acceptor could not be found (l). The protest must, in this country, be stamped (m). If the services of a notary cannot be obtained at the place where the bill is dishonoured, any householder, or "substantial resident of the place," may, in the presence of two witnesses, give a certificate attesting the dishonour of the bill, and the certificate will operate as if it were a formal protest of the bill (m). In ordinary cases the bill is protested for non-acceptance or non-payment at the place where it is dishonoured (n). But a bill which is presented through the post and returned by post dishonoured, may be protested at the place where it is returned; and a bill payable at the place of business or residence of some person other than the drawee which has been dishonoured, by non-acceptance, must be protested for non-payment at the place where it is payable (o).

The protest of a foreign bill is excused by any circumstance which would excuse the giving of notice, e. g., when, after the exercise of reasonable diligence, notice cannot be given (p).

"Where the acceptor of a bill becomes bankrupt or insolvent, or suspends payment before it matures, the holder may cause the bill to be protested for better security against the drawer and indorsers" (q).

The only consequence of such a "protest for better security" in the United Kingdom is that the bill may be accepted by any person for honour (r). It is not necessary to preserve the right of taking recourse against the drawer or indorser before maturity of the bill.

Section VII.—Payment.

Payment.

The payment must of course, subject to the provisions of the Act with respect to crossed cheques (s), be to the holder or his representative (t). Where money is paid into a bank on the joint account of persons not partners in trade, the bankers are not discharged by payment of the cheque of one of those persons without the authority of the other (u).

There are some rules respecting payment of a forged note or bill of which it is necessary to take notice. In general, a forged or an unauthorized signature is wholly inoperative (x). But, as we have seen, the acceptor is precluded from denying against a holder in due course the genuineness of the drawer's signature (y). If the drawee have not accepted, but pay a forged bill or note, he cannot recover his money back from such a holder; at all events, not unless he discovers the forgery and gives notice that very day before the position of the holder is changed (z). And the same diligence is incumbent on one who pays for the honour of a person whose signature has been forged (a). Nor will he who pays a forged bill or note have any remedy against the person whose signature has been forged, unless that person, by his gross negligence, facilitated the commission of the forgery (b); in which case, if the negligence was the proximate cause of the loss, he will have to bear it. Thus, where Hall drew upon his banker for 3*l.*, writing the sum in words and in figures, and the bearer of the cheque erased the words and figures and altered it into a cheque for 200*l.*, the banker who had paid a cheque thus altered was forced to bear the loss (c). But where a cheque for 50*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* was drawn so carelessly that the agent who presented it, and who had previously filled it up, was enabled to introduce a figure of 3 before the figures 50, and the words "three hundred" before the word "fifty," it was held that the drawer, not the banker who paid it in its altered state, should be the sufferer (d). A signature by procuration being a notice that the agent has a limited authority to sign, the party paying must ascertain the authority of the person so signing (e). So, likewise, a banker must ascertain the genuineness of all necessary indorsements of a bill (f).

Sect. 60 (re-enacting 16 & 17 Vict. c. 59, s. 19) enacts that a banker who pays in good faith and in the ordinary course of business (g) a bill payable to order on demand, that is, a cheque (sect. 73), is not bound to show that the indorsement of the payee or of any subsequent indorsee was genuine or authorised (h). Section 60 protects only a banker; the drawer may, in the absence of negligence conducing directly to the fraud, recover the money from the person who received it from the banker under a forged indorsement (i). This section does not apply to a bill the signature of the drawer of which is forged (k).

The person paying must also take care that there is no restrictive indorsement (l); and it is dangerous to pay before the instrument is due, as the bill may, in certain circumstances, be re-issued (m). When a bill is paid it is the duty of the holder to deliver it up to the person paying (n).

Payment supra protest.—After a bill has been protested for non-payment, any person may pay it supra protest for the honour of any one liable thereon; and he who does so is subrogated to the rights and duties of the holders as regards the party for whose honour he pays (o). Before he so pays he must take care that the bill is protested (p). Such a payment is usually made upon dishonour (q).

How enforced.—Payment of a bill or note may be enforced by action against the drawee, if he has accepted, and against the drawers or indorsers, if the bill has been dishonoured either by non-acceptance or non-payment. All these parties may be sued either in the same or different actions, and either at the same time or successively (s).

In general, the drawer or indorser of a bill to whom it has been re-indorsed has no remedy upon it against any intermediate parties, because he would be liable over to them; yet if it were indorsed by them under circumstances excluding their right to have recourse to him, for example, "without recourse" (t), or as sureties to him for the acceptor, he may sue upon them (u). A drawer who pays a bill to the order of a third person may enforce payment against the acceptor (x).

A payer for honour is subrogated to the rights and duties of the holder (y). It would seem that an indorser who paid would be entitled to all the benefit of the securities deposited with the holder by the acceptor (z).

What recoverable.—The holder is generally entitled to recover, from any party liable on the bill, the money expressed to be payable on the instrument, with interest from the time of presentment for payment if the bill is payable on demand, and from the maturity of the bill in any other case, together with the expenses of noting and protest if necessary (a). Such amount will be deemed liquidated damages, and may be recovered under R. S. C. 1883, Ord. XIV. r. 1 (b). On a bill dishonoured abroad the holder may, in lieu of the above damages, recover from the drawer or indorser the amount of the re-exchange, that is, the loss resulting from the dishonour, with interest until the time of payment (c). A bill of exchange, drawn by an Australian bank on its London agent, was indorsed to another Australian bank and presented for acceptance at the London branch. Acceptance was refused. It was admitted that, if the holder sent out the bill to Australia, he would be allowed, under the South Australian Bills of Exchange Act, 1884, 10 per cent. interest. North, J., held that the holder could recover only the amount of the re-exchange with interest.

"Those cases" (referring to Allen v. Kemble (d), and Gibbs v. Fremont (e)" show clearly that the liability to damages is to be measured according to the law of the country where the contract which was broken was entered into" (f).

Sect. 57 (1), he held, was limited to bills dishonoured at home, and sect. 57 (2) to bills dishonoured abroad, that is, at a place foreign to that where the bill was drawn or indorsed, and the only damages were those specified in sect. 57 (2).

Though the bill be returned through ever so many hands, the drawer will be liable for the re-exchange on each return (g). Before the passing of the Bills of Exchange Act, it had been decided that, in the event of the drawer paying the holder of the bill damages for re-exchange, the drawer could recover the amount from the acceptor (h); and the Act has made no change in this respect (i).

Section VIII.—Resistance against Payment.

Resistance against payment.

If the person sued upon a bill or note thinks proper to defend himself, he either denies that he was ever liable, or, admitting his liability to have existed, contends that it has been determined.

First, if he deny that he was ever liable, he may rely upon the absence of any of those circumstances which are above shown to be essential to the holder's right to recover, the presence of which he has not by his own act admitted (k); or on the insufficiency or illegality of the consideration for his liability.

Insufficiency of Consideration.—Contrary to the general rule which prevails respecting other simple contracts, a bill or note is always primâ facie presumed to have been given for a sufficient consideration (l). "Valuable consideration" is declared to be "any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract" (m), and to include "an antecedent debt or liability" (n). The presumption as to value is open to rebuttal, and the acceptor as against the drawer, the indorser as against the indorsee, may show that he has received no consideration, or no sufficient consideration, for his liability (o). The former circumstance may be a defence in toto (p); the latter is a defence pro tanto (q), provided the deficiency of consideration is ascertained and liquidated, for otherwise the remedy is by counterclaim or cross action (r). He may also protect himself on the ground that his signature was obtained by duress, or fraud (s); or that the bill or note has been lost, improperly converted, or stolen (t).

These defences are available against a holder who has not given value for the bill or note (u). But they may be rebutted by the fact that the holder is a "holder in due course," that is, that he took the bill or note in good faith and for value, and that he had no notice of any defects in title (x); where that is the case, it will be no defence that the bill was originally accommodation paper, and known by the holder so to be (y). Every holder is primâ facie presumed to be a holder in due course, that is, he will be presumed to have acquired his interest bonâ fide and for value, until, in an action, it is admitted or proved that the acceptance, issue, or indorsement is affected with fraud or illegality, in which case the burthen of proof is shifted, unless and until the holder proves that subsequent to such fraud or illegality he has given value in good faith (z). of the drawer or acceptor—indorses it over in breach of the trust reposed in him, an indorsee who has notice of the trust at the time of the indorsement cannot acquire any better right or title to the bill than the indorser had (a). It is not sufficient for the purpose of casting such a suspicion on the holder's title as would call on him to prove that he had given value, to show that the bill was an accommodation bill; for that purpose it should be shown that the bill was obtained from the acceptor, or some person between him and the holder, fraudulently (b).

When a bill or note is taken by the holder overdue, he takes it subject to any defects of title affecting it at its maturity, or, as they used to be called, the equities attaching to the bill, that is, such equities as naturally arise out of the bill transaction, and are not merely collateral (c). A right of set-off would not be such an equity (d); on the other hand, the fact that a bill was purchased with another person's money would constitute such a defect (e). This rule does not apply to overdue cheques (f).

Illegality of Consideration.—Another ground of defence against an immediate party to a bill or note is the illegality of the consideration (g); as that the bill or note was secretly given for joining in the acceptance of a composition (h); for prostitution (i);

Bills given in respect of a wager are, by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, made void, but the onus of proving that a holder gave no value lies on the defendant (q). Payment by the drawer of the acceptor's bets on horse races is good consideration (r).

Where the consideration of a bill or note is partly illegal, the security, being entire, becomes void in toto (s), though the plaintiff may still, without using the bill or note, recover that part of the consideration which is good (t). If a bill or note given for an illegal consideration be renewed, the new instrument is also void (u), though not, if it be so reformed as to exclude that part of the consideration which was objectionable (x).

Resistance against payment.

Formerly, in some cases of illegality, the bill was void even in the hands of a holder bonâ fide, and for value. These were, where the consideration was, either wholly or in part, for money lost or applied in any of the modes of gaming above enumerated (y). But by the stat. 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 41, it is enacted, s. 1, that no bill or note shall be absolutely void on any of the above grounds, but that any bill or note that would have been void on any of the above grounds shall be deemed to have been drawn, accepted, made or taken for an illegal consideration (z); and (s. 2) that if any person shall make, draw, give or execute any such note or bill, and shall pay to any indorsee or holder thereof the money thereby secured, or any part thereof, such money shall be deemed to have been paid for and on account of the person to whom such bill or note was originally given upon such illegal consideration as aforesaid, and shall be a debt due from such last-mentioned person to the person who shall have so paid the money. When the illegality was such as to make the instrument void in the hands even of a bonâ fide indorsee, yet if it were not originally made on that consideration, such illegality in the consideration on which it was afterwards transferred, was no defence against such indorsee, if he was not, in making out his title, bound to state or prove the signature of the person who made the illegal transfer (a); the authorities were contradictory upon the question whether such illegality was a defence, when he was bound to state the signature and prove it (b). As to gaming securities, it was never any objection to an action against the indorsee that the bill or note was made on a gaming consideration; for, though the statute directed that they should be void to all intents and purposes, that meant only so far as was necessary to further the purposes of the Act; and, to exempt an indorser from suit, might have assisted a winner, whom the statute meant to punish, not to protect (c). The Bills of Exchange Act enacts that a "holder in due course," that is, one who has taken a bill complete and regular on the face of it in good faith and for value, is not affected by illegality in the inception of the bill, if he had no notice of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it. And any holder who derives his title from a holder in due course, and who is not himself a party to any fraud or illegality affecting it, has all the rights of the holder in due course against the acceptor and all parties to the bill prior to the holder in due course (d). Consequently a bill originally given for an illegal consideration may be sued upon by an indorsee for value without notice. Bills or notes, however, may be absolutely void against both immediate parties and holders in due course, either because the alleged parties did not make them, or had not the capacity. Such are (subject to exceptions (e)) forged instruments; or notes issued by companies not capable of making them; e.g., a railway company (f).

Again, the defendant may admit his former liability, but contend that it has been determined by the suspension, extinguishment, satisfaction, or discharge of the holder's right of action. We will say a few words concerning each of these grounds of defence.

1st, Of Suspension.—If the holder renew the bill or note, that is, if he take another bill or note from the defendant in continuation of it, his right of action on the first bill or note is suspended (g) till he has satisfied the defendant that he has no claim against him on the second, e. g., by delivering it up. There may,

But the receipt of bills accepted by a third person, which are not negotiable by the party giving them, will not suspend the remedy: James v. Williams, 13 M. & W. 828; Williams v. James, 2 Exch. 798. Whether taking a bill really operates as a suspension, or only as a conditional payment, see Belshaw v. Bush, 11 C. B. 191; Bottomley v. Nuttall, 5 C. B. N. S. 122.

after a bill or note has been drawn or made, be a binding verbal promise for valuable consideration to renew it when due (h). But the defendant who relies on such a promise must show that he took proper steps to obtain the renewal (i). And such a verbal promise must not be contemporaneous with the drawing of the bill or note, or, if it be made to an indorser, with his indorsement; if it be, the law will not enforce it; for to do so would be to incorporate with a written contract an incongruous parol condition, which is contrary to first principles (k). But a contemporaneous written agreement for renewal will afford an answer as between the parties to it (l).

2ndly, Extinguishment or Merger.—The defendant's liability on the bill or note will be extinguished or merged, if the plaintiff obtain from him a security of a higher description, e. g., a judgment upon it against him (m). Such a judgment is not per se a satisfaction of the debt, nor will it, until satisfaction, prevent the holder from proceeding on the bill or note against any other distinct party to it (n). A judgment, though unsatisfied, against one of several joint acceptors or makers, is a good defence to an action against the others (o). But it is not so if the acceptors or makers are joint and several (p).

3rdly, Satisfaction or Payment.—Satisfaction is by actual payment of the bill or note, or what is equivalent to payment (q); and this releases all parties subsequent to the person making it, as well as all prior parties for his accommodation. It differs from extinguishment, inasmuch as, though the holder's claim may be extinguished as to some and not as to others, yet if satisfied as to any, it is satisfied as to all of these parties (r). But payment of a bill, even at maturity, by a drawer for value, who is also the payee (s), or by an indorser (t), or by a stranger (u) upon his own account, will not discharge the acceptor (v). The payment must be by or on behalf of the drawee or acceptor (x). There may be a satisfaction pro tanto, as by part payment, or the receipt of dividends under a bankruptcy (y).

Any material alteration of a bill or note after it has been issued, without the assent of all parties liable on the bill, avoids the bill, except as against a person who has made or assented to the alteration and subsequent indorsers (z). But if the material alteration be not apparent, a holder in due course may enforce payment of it according to its original tenour (a). This is an alteration of the common law. Even though the parties consent to such an alteration after issue, the instrument, though unimpeachable by them, is a new contract, and the old stamp will not suffice (b), unless such alteration were made to correct a mistake, and render the bill what it was originally meant to have been (c). Alterations in the date (d), sum payable, or time or place for payment, or addition of a place of payment without the acceptor's assent, or words expressing the value received to be on a particular account (e), or adding a new maker or drawer (f), are material (g). But the insertion of a mere memorandum, giving the right place for payment, or the correction of the drawee's name to make it correspond with his acceptance, or an alteration of the marginal figures, are, it has been held, not so (h); and an alteration perfectly immaterial to the rights of the parties will have no effect (i). Nor will the alteration affect its validity, if made with the consent of parties before it has issued (k). A bill or note is issued when it is first delivered complete in form to a person who takes it as holder (l): and this is, primâ facie, so soon as it is passed away by the drawer or maker, or (when the alteration is in the acceptance) accepted by the drawee (m). alteration, it is for the holder to account for it (q). But the mere cancellation, unintentionally, or under a mistake, or without the authority of the holder, is inoperative (r).

An alteration even by a stranger in a material point will vitiate the instrument, as it was the laches of the holder in not keeping it safely. See the principle laid down and explained in Davidson v. Cooper, 13 M. & W. 343 (Exch. Ch.)

4thly. Different kinds of Discharge.—An acceptance or note may be waived, either expressly or impliedly, so as to discharge the acceptor or maker (s). But neither length of time, silence, nor a declaration by the holder that he should look to the drawer for payment, are sufficient to discharge the acceptor (t). The "renunciation," as the waiver is termed in the Act, must be absolute and unconditional, and, unless the bill is delivered up to the acceptor, must be in writing (u).

It is a maxim of law, that if one principal in a contract, by any act of his own, discharge, or even give time, though but for a moment, to the other principal, he discharges all his sureties. In the contract by bill, the acceptor, or by note the maker, is considered, primâ facie, the principal, and the drawer or indorsers as his sureties; and, consequently, if the holder either discharge or suspend his remedy against the former, the latter, unless he expressly reserves his remedies against them (x), or they have previously consented to it (y), or afterwards promised to pay with knowledge of it, are all immediately discharged (z). But a mere delay or forbearance to sue the acceptor or maker, without any valid agreement not to do so, will not discharge them (a); nor will the taking a collateral security from the acceptor as a new bill, not in renewal of the old one (b). Primâ facie a subsequent indorser stands in the light of a surety for the prior ones (c), and, therefore, if the holder discharge or give time to a prior indorser, he will discharge those subsequent to him (d). But the discharge of a subsequent indorser does not discharge a prior one (e). In Hall v. Cole (f), the drawer of a bill payable to his own order indorsed it to A., who indorsed it back to the drawer, and the drawer then indorsed it to B. In an action by B. against A., it was held that the acceptance by B. of a cognovit from the drawer discharged A., though it did not appear whether the cognovit was given in the character of drawer or in that of indorser.

It was once thought that the acceptor of an accommodation bill, or maker of an accommodation note, stood in the light of a surety, and that the holder would discharge him by discharging or giving time to the person for whose accommodation he accepted or made it (g). But this has often been questioned; and certainly would not now be so decided, where the holder, when he gave the discharge or indulgence, did not know of the accommodation (h). If he did know it when he received the instrument (i), or gave the discharge or indulgence (k), the accommodation acceptor or maker will be discharged. The surety, however, would not be discharged by the holder's taking from the principal a cognovit, defeasible upon the payment of instalments, the first of which would fall due before the person giving it could have been sued to execution (l). One joint maker of a note is discharged by the holder's discharging the other, and that without any reference to the law of principal and surety, but on the ground that the creditor's discharge of one joint debtor is a discharge of all (m).

When the drawer or indorser of a bill accepted for value is compelled to pay it, he is entitled, as surety, to the benefit of securities deposited with the holder by the acceptor to secure its payment, and in the possession of the holder at the time of dishonour (n).

"There is neither principle nor authority for saying that the indorsers are, during the currency of the bill, sureties, or in the nature of sureties, to the indorsee, or that they have any equity to prevent the indorsee from dealing as it may seem to him most desirable with any other parties, unless thereby he prevents himself from giving notice of dishonour, so as to give them their remedy against prior parties to the bill; and I agree that any contrary decision would be very mischievous. notice of dishonour had been given to the indorsers, the position of the parties is altered. Though the indorser is primarily liable as principal on the bill, and is not strictly a surety for the acceptor, he has this in common with a surety for the acceptor, that he is entitled to the benefit of all payments made by the acceptor, and is entitled, on paying the holder, to be put in a situation to have a right to sue the acceptor" (o). Section IX.—Foreign Bills.

Sect. 4 of the Bills of Exchange Act defines a foreign bill as any other than an inland bill, which is defined as "a bill which is, or on the face of it purports to be, both drawn and payable within the 'British Islands' (i. e., any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Islands of Man, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, and Sark, and the islands adjacent thereto being part of the dominions of her Majesty), or drawn within the British Islands upon some person resident therein" (p). As to the capacity of the parties to such a bill the Act says nothing; but sect. 22 provides that capacity to incur liability is co-extensive with capacity to contract, which would seem to imply that the domicile of the contracting parties will determine it (q). In most foreign laws greater strictness as to the form of negotiable instruments is required than is here necessary. Thus, in Germany a bill must be described in the body of it as a bill of exchange, the payee must be named, the drawer must sign his name, and the bill must bear the date and name of the place of issue (r). In France the signature of the acceptor must be accompanied by the word "accepté" (s). Foreign bills.

Sect. 72 of the Act provides that—payable in another, the rights, duties, and liabilities of the parties thereto are determined as follows:—

"(1.) The validity of a bill as regards requisites in form is determined by the law of the place of issue (i. e., the place where the first delivery took place, complete in form, to a person who takes as holder (t)), and the validity as regards requisites in form of the supervening contracts, such as acceptance, or indorsement, or acceptance supra protest, is determined by the law of the place where such contract was made."

In other words, the lex loci contractus governs the validity of the form of a bill. The Act specifies the following exceptions:—

"(a) Where a bill is issued out of the United Kingdom, it is not invalid by reason only that it is not stamped in accordance with the law of the place of issue (u).

"(b) Where a bill, issued out of the United Kingdom, conforms, as regards requisites in form, to the law of the United Kingdom, it may, for the purpose of enforcing payment thereof, be treated as valid as between all persons who negotiate, hold, or become parties to it in the United Kingdom (v).

"(2.) Subject to the provisions of this Act (x), the interpretation of the drawing, indorsement, acceptance, or acceptance supra protest of a bill, is determined by the law of the place where such contract is made; provided that where an inland bill is indorsed in a foreign country, the indorsement shall, as regards the payer, be interpreted according to the law of the United Kingdom" (y).

On a bill of exchange payable to order, drawn in France, accepted and payable in England, the contract of the acceptor is to pay to an order valid by the law of England. An indorsee can, therefore, maintain an action in England against the acceptor, on an indorsement valid by English law, although the indorsement was made in France, and apparently by French law gave no right to the indorsee to sue in his own name, and although the indorser (who was also drawer and payee) and the indorsee were, at the time the bill was made and indorsed, subjects of France and domiciled and resident in that country (z). The last part of the section appears to recognise the case of De la Chaumette v. Bank of England (a), where it was held that the title to an English note to bearer passed by delivery, though such mode of transfer was not recognised by the law of France. Foreign bills.

"(3.) The duties of the holder with respect to presentment for acceptance or payment, and the necessity for or sufficiency of a protest or notice of dishonour, or otherwise, are determined by the law of the place where the act is done, or the bill is dishonoured" (b).

A bill of exchange, drawn in England, and payable in Spain, was indorsed in England by the defendant to the plaintiff, who indorsed it to M., a resident in Spain. By the law of Spain no notice of dishonour by non-acceptance is required. Acceptance was refused, and twelve days passed before M. wrote to inform the plaintiff of the dishonour; the plaintiff on receipt from M. of notice of dishonour gave immediate notice to the defendant. It was held that the plaintiff could recover the amount of the bill from the defendant, the drawer (c). In delivering judgment, Brett, L. J., said:—

"Every party to a bill knows that by the law merchant it may be indorsed abroad. He, by the law merchant, undertakes some liability in respect of such indorsement abroad. The question is, how will he be affected by such indorsement abroad? Such an indorsement raises a contract between the immediate indorser and indorsee. Such an indorsement, then, raises a foreign contract, and that must be construed according to the law of the country in which it was made. The liability of each of those contracting parties to the other is to be determined by the law of the country in which the contract was made" (d).

The Act further provides that—

"(4.) Where a bill is drawn out of, but payable in, the United Kingdom, and the sum payable is not expressed in the currency of the United Kingdom, the amount shall, in the absence of some express stipulation, be calculated according to the rate of exchange for sight drafts at the place of payment on the day the bill is payable" (b).

If, for instance, a bill is drawn in New York on London, and the amount is expressed in dollars, the sum in English money which the holder is entitled to receive will be calculated according to the above rule. For stamp purposes, the duty would be "calculated on the value of such money in British currency according to the current rate of exchange on the day of the date of the instrument" (c).

"(5.) Where a bill is drawn in one country and is payable in another, the due date thereof is determined according to the law of the place where it is payable" (d).

In France or Germany, no days of grace are allowed, and bills are there payable on the day of maturity (e).

Section X.—Remedy upon lost Bills or Notes.

Remedy upon lost bills or notes.

At common law, if a negotiable bill or note, that is, payable in its original state to bearer or order, were lost, the loser, so long as it remained lost, could not maintain an action upon it (f); nor could any action be maintained for the consideration on which it was given, since it operated as payment (g). The circumstance that it was payable to order, and was not indorsed, did not entitle the party to sustain this action, since "the law merchant requires the production of the instrument before a party to it can be called on to pay it" (h).

Remedy upon lost bills or notes.

So if a bill or note transferable by delivery be cut in halves, and half be lost, it was held that the holder cannot sue at law upon the other half (i). But if the bill or note were not in its original state negotiable, as where it was payable to the payee only (j), he might maintain an action either on it, or on the original consideration, if any, since no one else could acquire a title to it (unless, indeed, the defendant would have had a remedy over on the bill or note upon paying it) (k). Lord Campbell, in his note to Pierson v. Hutchinson (l), suggests that "another distinction may perhaps be taken with respect to a bill indorsed in blank, and lost after it has become due: as the finder could not in that case give an effectual right of action even to an indorsee for value and without notice, it may be thought that the acceptor cannot insist on an indemnity." However, he afterwards observes, that "as the plaintiff might make out a primâ facie case by proving the acceptance and indorsement, it might be hard to expose the acceptor, after payment of the bill without any indemnity, to the hazard of showing by legal evidence that the bill had been lost after it became due." And accordingly this distinction had been virtually denied to exist (m).

In order to avail himself of this defence, it must be pleaded; and if it be not, the plaintiff, upon a denial of the making, &c., may prove the loss or destruction of the bill, and give secondary evidence of it, as of any other document (n). If there be no pleading, which renders it necessary for the plaintiff to produce the bill on the trial, and the plaintiff do not produce it, the only result will be, that he may not be able to obtain interest for the period before action, if the form of the claim does not show when it became due (o).

Remedy upon lost bills or notes.

In cases where the loser of a bill was precluded by the above rules from enforcing payment in a Court of law, he could formerly only obtain relief in equity on giving a proper indemnity (o). The Common Law Procedure Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 87, provides that, "in case of any action founded on a bill of exchange or other negotiable instrument (p), it shall be lawful for the Court or a Judge to order that the loss of such instrument shall not be set up (q); provided an indemnity is given to the satisfaction of the Court or Judge, or a Master, against the claims of any other person upon such negotiable instrument." This section is not repealed. But the Bills of Exchange Act enacts as follows:—

Sect. 69. "Where a bill has been lost before it is overdue, the person who was the holder of it may apply to the drawer to give him another bill of the same tenor, giving security to the drawer, if required, to indemnify him against all persons whatever, in case the bill alleged to have been lost shall be found again. If the drawer on request as aforesaid refuses to give such duplicate bill, he may be compelled to do so" (r).

Sect. 70. "In any action or proceeding upon a bill the Court or a Judge may order that the loss of the instrument shall not be set up, provided an indemnity be given to the satisfaction of the Court or Judge against the claims of any other person upon the instrument in question" (s).

These sections apparently do not extend to indorsements.

CONTRACTS WITH CARRIERS.

Contracts with carriers.

A COMMON carrier is one who undertakes for hire to transport from place to place the goods of such as choose to employ him (a). Of this description are the proprietors of stage-waggons and coaches which carry goods for hire, lightermen (b), hoymen, barge-owners, ferrymen (c), canal-boatmen, owners and masters of ships engaged generally in the transportation of goods for hire, and other persons owning similar instruments of public conveyance (d). Railway companies are common carriers with regard to the goods they profess to carry, unless the Acts constituting them limit their liability (e). They are bound to afford all reasonable facilities for the forwarding and delivering of all traffic within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, even though the company is not a common carrier of such articles (f). A town carman not plying between certain termini, but undertaking casual jobs, is not, properly speaking, a common carrier (g); nor is a stage-coach owner, who carries passengers only. A stage-coach owner or railway company carrying passengers does not warrant their safety, or that the carriage is free from defects, at all events (h); but only that, so far as human care, skill, and foresight will go, their safe conveyance will be provided for (i).

Carriers may make such conditions as they deem proper with respect to the carriage of passengers (j).

It is now settled law that stage-coach owners or railway companies carrying passengers are liable as insurers of their personal luggage (k). Apparently, it matters not that the luggage has been placed at the passenger's request in the carriage with him. "A railway company, in accepting a passenger's luggage for carriage in a passenger train, and in the carriage with the passenger himself, do enter into a contract as common carriers, modified only to the extent that if loss happens by reason of want of care of the passenger himself, who has taken within his own immediate control the goods which are lost, their contract as insurers does not apply to loss occasioned by the passenger's own default" (l). But if a passenger takes, without notice to the company, merchandise or articles other than the personal luggage which a traveller usually carries, the company will not be responsible for loss or damage (m). chief difficulty in recent cases has been in determining whether such luggage has been received by the company's servants for the purpose of carriage. On the one hand, luggage may be entrusted to a porter so long before the departure of a train that the porter cannot be considered to have received it as the agent of the company. "Railway companies have provided cloak rooms or left-luggage offices, which are the proper receptacles for luggage brought to the station under such circumstances" (n). On the other hand, it is equally clear that the company may, as carriers, be in the possession of the luggage, if their porter receives it for the purpose of conveying it to the train, although the passenger does not intend to travel forthwith by their train (o).

The duty (p) of a common carrier is to carry the goods of all persons offering (for there need not be an actual tender (q)) to pay his hire (r) (unless, indeed, his carriage be full, or the goods are of such a kind as to be liable to extraordinary danger, or such as he is unaccustomed or unable to convey (s)), to take proper care of them in their passage, and to make a safe and right delivery of them at the time agreed upon, or, in the absence of any stipulation in that respect, within a reasonable time (t). A carrier is not bound to carry by the shortest, if it be not the ordinary route (u). Nor is he bound to deliver goods within any particular time. In the absence of a special contract, it is sufficient if he deliver them within a reasonable time. "It is the duty of a common carrier to convey the goods without an unnecessary delay or deviation; but it may be necessary for the safe carriage of the goods that he should either delay or deviate in his course, and he is then justified in doing so" (x).

At common law he stands in the situation of an insurer of the property entrusted to him, and is answerable for every loss or damage happening to it while in his custody, no matter by what cause occasioned, unless it were by the act of God, such as a tempest, or of nature, or a defect in the thing carried (y), or that of the king's enemies. The carrier will not be liable for deterioration by evaporation or leakage, or the inherent vice of the article (z). In other cases, even his entire faultlessness does not excuse him (a). Thus he is liable for damage done by accidental fire, or by a robbery (b). mination of their journey, under a contract, express or implied, by which the nature of his employment, and, of course, of his liabilities with regard to them, may be altered (d). For instance, if, on their arrival, he agree to hold them as a warehouseman or wharfinger (e).

Throughout the whole transit or journey, even if part of it is over the line of another company, unless the company stipulates to the contrary (f), this liability extends (g); and a person who holds himself out as a common carrier of goods between two places, one of which is outside England, is subject to the common law liability of carriers (h).

This being the rule of the common law, regulating all cases in which there was no special contract between carriers and their employers, the former soon found it their interest to make agreements requiring a premium in proportion to the risk incurred, where the goods intrusted to them were beyond a certain value. This was generally done by inserting in the newspapers, distributing in handbills, and sticking up in their offices a notice, that they would not be accountable for any property beyond a certain value, unless insured, and paid for at the time of delivery. If this notice were brought home to the knowledge of the employer (for that was indispensably necessary in order to render it available (i)), his consent to his terms was implied (k), and the carrier became entitled to the protection for which he stipulated (l). He might even be entitled to be relieved from liability for the consequences of his own default; but these notices, as generally worded and interpreted by courts of law, only exonerated the carrier from liability for loss or damage occurring to uninsured goods, without fault on his part; for if he were guilty of wilful misconduct or gross negligence, he was chargeable with the damage occasioned thereby, and his notice was not permitted to limit his responsibility (m), unless the employer had been guilty of a concealment of the nature and value of the property (n), for that would have discharged the carrier, even though he had given no notice.

The construction of these notices, and the necessity of proving that they had arrived at the employer's knowledge, having given rise to much litigation, the Legislature enacted positive regulations on the subject. Those which concern Carriers by Sea we will enumerate under the head Contracts of Affreightment; those concerning Carriers by Land and Canal are the Carriers Act (11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 68), the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), the Regulation of Railways Acts, 1868 and 1873 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119, and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 48), and the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25) (o).

the value of 10*l.* and so declared as aforesaid, may demand an increased rate of charge, to be announced by a notice in legible characters affixed in the office (d); and persons sending parcels are to be bound by such notice, without further proof of the same having come to their knowledge. By sect. 3, carriers shall, if required, give a receipt for the parcel, acknowledging the same to have been insured (e), which receipt shall not be liable to any stamp duty; and carriers who do not give such receipt when required, or affix the proper notice, are not entitled to the benefit of this Act, but shall be responsible as at common law, and liable to refund the increased charge. Carriers cannot, by a notice, limit their liability at common law to answer for the loss of any articles in respect whereof they are not entitled to the benefit of this Act (f). Every office of such common carrier shall be deemed a receiving-house (g); any one proprietor shall be liable to be sued, and no action shall abate for the want of joining any co-proprietor (h). Parties entitled to damages for parcels lost or damaged may recover the extra charges for insurance (i).

"Loss," in sect. 1, means a loss by the carrier of the article itself (k), and not a loss sustained by the owner by reason of delay, or a temporary loss (l). The Act does not protect a common carrier from liability to answer for losses or injury arising from the felonious acts (m) of any servant in his employ; a term which includes not merely his own immediate servants, but those employed by any person with whom he may contract to perform part of his duty (n). Nor does it protect any such servant from liability to answer for the consequences of his own neglect or misconduct (o). The Act extends to a loss at a point, to which the goods have been negligently taken by the carrier, beyond the intended destination (p). Common carriers are not concluded as to the value of any parcel by the value declared (q). The carrier is not, in a case within the Act, liable for a loss of the articles named in the statute, though occasioned by the gross negligence of his servants, not amounting to a misfeasance (r).

It was at one time supposed (s) that the notice directed by the 2nd section to be affixed in the office, was a substitute for the notice formerly employed, and that, unless this was put up, the person sending the goods was under no obligation to notify their description and value, and the carrier was liable for their loss. This view proved to be erroneous; the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the protection afforded by the 1st section is absolute, unless the value and nature of the articles be declared, and also that it applies not only in cases where the goods are delivered to the carrier at an office, but on the road, or at any other place. Contracts with carriers.

"The meaning of the legislature is, that all persons sending goods of a particular description and value, whenever they deliver them to the carrier, are bound to give information of the nature and value of the articles. That is the first clause; and the object of the legislature was, that such information shall be given, whether the goods were delivered at the office of the carrier, or at the sender's house, or on the road, or elsewhere, and clauses follow with certain provisions as to what is then to be done. Although the value and nature of the articles may be declared, it does not necessarily follow that the carrier would be protected; but a different clause must be acted on before his liability ceases. However, the first step to be taken is, that the sender of the goods notify their value; then it is that the carrier is entitled to have a larger charge. He cannot have that larger charge, or save himself from responsibility, by saying, 'I will have such and such a sum of money;' but he must have a tariff stuck up in his office, to notify to all persons sending articles of that kind what he proposes to demand beyond the usual charge. The notice required by the 2nd section to be affixed in the office is not a notice that the carrier means to avail himself of the benefit of the Act, and that all persons who send articles of a particular description and value shall tell him that they are of that description and value, for the Statute requires that in the first instance; but it is only a notice of what the extra charge is to be."

Special contracts are not to be affected by this Act (u); but if they be not inconsistent with the exemption, it will apply (v). Independently of the Act, the carrier may make what terms he pleases. Whether the consignor has, in fact, assented to the conditions—whether, for example, he is bound by printed conditions on a receipt or ticket—may be a question of difficulty (x). But if a carrier receive goods upon the terms that he is only to be responsible for particular risks, he will only be liable for them (y); or that the owner shall take all risks of the conveyance, and that he, the carrier, shall not be responsible for damage howsoever caused, he will not be liable even for the gross negligence of himself or his servants (z). The ticket to this effect, delivered by the carrier to the person bringing the goods, may constitute such a special contract, and not a mere notice which would be void under the 4th section (a). A notice, too, to the like effect previously served by the carrier on the person sending the goods, and not expressly dissented from by him, is sufficient to warrant a jury in finding that there was such a special contract, and that he did not receive them as a common carrier (b).

The railway companies, which had acquired, by means of the facilities and powers conferred on them by Parliament, and their union with the canals, which, for the most part, had become attached to them, a monopoly in effect of the carrying trade throughout the country, proceeded to take advantage of these decisions, and create for themselves, through the medium of such tickets and notices, exemption from risk, even for their own carelessness and misconduct. In order, therefore, to prevent them from subjecting the public to unreasonable and improper conditions (c), "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (d), provides, by s. 7 :—

"That every such company as aforesaid shall be liable for the loss of, or for any injury done to any horses, cattle or other animals (e), or to any articles, goods or things in the receiving (f), forwarding or delivering (g) thereof, occasioned by the neglect or

"The fair meaning of the section, as it seems to me, is this:—The first branch of it declares that all notices, conditions or declarations made and given by the company, shall be null and void in so far as they go to release the company from liability for loss of or injury to goods, &c., in the receiving, forwarding or delivering thereof, occasioned by the neglect or default of the company or its servants. But then it goes on to provide, in the next branch, that this shall not prevent the company from making such conditions which shall be adjudged by the Court or judge, before whom any question relating thereto shall be tried, to be just and reasonable. And, further, though just and reasonable, such condition or 'special contract' shall not be binding, unless signed by the person sending or delivering the goods. The result seems to be this:—A general notice is void: but the company may make special contracts with their customers, provided they are just and reasonable, and signed; and whereas the monopoly created by railway companies compels the public to employ them in the conveyance of their goods, the legislature have thought fit to impose the further security that the Court shall see that the condition or special contract is just and reasonable" (s).

This interpretation of the statute was adopted by the Exchequer Chamber in McManus v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Ry. Co. (t), and subsequently, in Peek v. North Staffordshire Ry.

Co. (u), by the House of Lords; Lord Westbury and Lord Wensleydale in the latter adopting the above language. Every special contract for carriage, that is, every contract subject to other terms than common law liabilities of the carrier, must be in writing, must be just and reasonable, and signed by the person sending or delivering the goods.

Whether the conditions which a railway company has imposed be just and reasonable, must depend, in many instances, upon the circumstances of the particular case (v). The burden of showing that the contract is reasonable lies on the company. A condition which provides that the company shall not be responsible for any damage, however caused (x), or in any case (y), is certainly unreasonable and bad (z). The circumstance that alternative rates or terms are offered is a material, though not conclusive, element in determining the reasonableness of a contract (a).

in the terms of the consignment note in the present case, is primâ facie not just and reasonable, and that, if no other alternative is offered to the consignor, the company are liable for the negligence of their servants, notwithstanding the stipulations of the contract of carriage. It is equally well settled, since the decision of your Lordships' House, in the case of Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. v. Brown (c), that, if the consignor has an offer bonâ fide made to him of having his goods carried upon terms just and reasonable, and voluntarily chooses, in consideration of a pecuniary benefit, to exonerate the carrier from any part of his ordinary responsibility, a contract thus limiting the carrier's liability may be just and reasonable, though without the alternative option it would not be. It appears to me, that all the questions in the present case resolve themselves into this one: was the alternative offered to the plaintiff, and which it was open to him to accept in lieu of that contained in the contract, which he in fact entered into, a just and reasonable one? I may remark, before I proceed further, that, in my opinion, the question whether a contract is just and reasonable within the meaning of the statute, must be determined by the Court or judge alone, and that it is not a question proper to be left to a jury, even though questions of fact be necessarily involved in its determination."

By sect. 2 of the Act railway and canal companies are required, "according to their respective powers," to "afford all reasonable facilities for the receiving and forwarding and delivering of traffic upon and from the several railways and canals belonging to or worked by such companies respectively, and for the return of carriages, trucks, boats, and other vehicles" (d). Thus conveniently timed trains may be ordered (e); and a company may be required to erect other structures than those which actually exist, if such are within their powers (f). The decision of the Court of Appeal in Dickson v. Great Northern Rail. Co. (g), gives to this provision a very important effect. It imposes on railway companies the duty of receiving, carrying, and forwarding all traffic, that is, all passengers, goods, and animals.

"The important point," says Lindley, L. J. (h), "is that railway companies are bound to carry goods and animals which they have facilities for carrying. It would, however, be a mistake to suppose that railway companies are bound to carry, as common carriers, everything which they can be required to carry under the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854. Railway companies are bound by that Act to provide reasonable facilities for carrying passengers, but they are not common carriers of passengers. So railway companies are bound to provide reasonable facilities for carrying animals or particular classes of goods; but it by no means follows that they are liable as common carriers for what they are bound by statute to carry. This distinction is important and requires to be borne in mind. Whether railway companies are common carriers of particular classes of goods depends upon what they habitually do, or profess to do, with respect to such goods. The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, does not make railway companies liable as common carriers in respect of goods which they do not profess to carry as such. This was, in fact, decided in Oxlade v. North Eastern Rail. Co." (i).

At common law a carrier was not bound to charge his customers equally (j), provided the charges were reasonable. But by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, s. 2, it was enacted that—"No such company shall make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to or in favour of any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, nor shall any such company subject any particular person or company or any particular description of traffic to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever" (k).

In general, differences in charges not accounted for by differences in cost of service will be regarded as undue preference (l). The section extends to terminal charges (m). Thus a lowering of rates, not in consequence of difference of cost of service, but in order to exclude competition, will be deemed undue preference (n). But the section does not apply to rates charged by a railway company for the use of docks owned by them, but wholly unconnected with their business as a railway company (o). It has been held that it is no defence to an action for charges that they are unreasonable, and that they give an undue preference (oo).

By the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25), it is enacted—

Sect. 27—"(1.) Whenever it is shown that any railway company charge one trader or class of traders, or the traders in any district, lower tolls, rates, or charges for the same or similar merchandise, or lower tolls, rates, or charges for the same or similar services, than they charge to other traders, or classes of traders, or to the traders in another district, or make any difference in treatment in respect of any such trader or traders, the burden of proving that such lower charge or difference in treatment does not amount to an undue preference shall lie on the railway company.

"(2.) In deciding whether a lower charge or difference in treatment does or does not amount to an undue preference, the Court having jurisdiction in the matter, or the Commissioners, as the case may be, may, so far as they think reasonable, in addition to any other considerations affecting the case, take into consideration whether such lower charge or difference in treatment is necessary for the purpose of securing in the interests of the public the traffic in respect of which it is made (p), and whether the inequality cannot be removed without unduly reducing the rates charged to the complainant: Provided that no railway company shall make, nor shall the Court, or the Commissioners, sanction any difference in the tolls, rates, or charges made for, or any difference in the treatment of, home and foreign merchandise, in respect of the same or similar services.

"(3.) The Court or the Commissioners shall have power to direct that no higher charge shall be made to any person for services in respect of merchandise carried over a less distance than is made to any other persons for similar services in respect of the like description and quantity of merchandise carried over a greater distance on the same line of railway" (p).

Sect. 29.—"(1.) Notwithstanding any provision in any general or special Act, it shall be lawful for any railway company, for the purpose of fixing the rates to be charged for the carriage of merchandise to and from any place on their railway, to group together any number of places in the same district, situated at various distances from any point of destination or departure of merchandise, and to charge a uniform rate or uniform rates of carriage for merchandise to and from all places comprised in the group from and to any point of destination or departure.

"(2.) Provided that the distances shall not be unreasonable, and that the group rates charged and the places grouped together shall not be such as to create an undue preference" (q).

The Railway Commission, established by the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, has been re-organized, and its jurisdiction much enlarged, by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (r). To a Commission, styled the Railway and Canal Commission, and consisting of two appointed Commissioners and three ex officio Commissioners, are transferred the jurisdiction and powers vested in the Railway Commissioners established by the Act of 1873. Sect. 9 enacts—

"Where any enactment in a special Act—

"(a) contains provisions relating to traffic facilities, undue preference, or other matters mentioned in section two of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854; or

"(b) requires a company to which this part of this Act applies to provide any station, road, or other similar work for public accommodation; or Act applies, any obligation in favour of the public or any individual;"

the Commissioners have the like jurisdiction to hear and determine as in the case of a contravention of sect. 2 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act.

Under that Act and the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, no action lay for breach of the provisions as to undue preference (s). But sect. 10 of the Act of 1888 enacts that—

"Where any question or dispute arises, involving the legality of any toll, rate, or charge, or portion of a toll, rate, or charge, charged or sought to be charged for merchandise traffic by a company to which this part of this Act applies, the Commissioners shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the same, and to enforce payment of such toll, rate, or charge, or so much thereof as the Commissioners decide to be legal."

They may also, in addition or substitution for other relief, award damages (t).

Generally speaking, when goods are forwarded in pursuance of an order which binds the person giving it to receive the goods, as the property in them passes to that person by the delivery to the carrier, he is the proper plaintiff if they be lost (u); for the vendor was his agent to employ the carrier (v). But it is otherwise when the property in the goods has not yet passed to the vendee, as where there is no writing or acceptance sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and the carrier was not of his selection (x); or where the goods are sent merely for approval (y), or the consignee is the agent of the consignor (z), or the carrier has contracted to be liable to the consignor in consideration of the latter's becoming responsible for the price of the carriage (a). The question with whom the contract or carriage was made is to be determined by the whole terms. In Great Western Rail. Co. v. Bagge (b), it appeared that the consignor had contracted with the consignee to pay the carriage, and it was held that the consignor was liable to pay the freight. It frequently happens that goods are sent to a booking-office keeper for the purpose of being delivered by him to a carrier. In such case, the booking-office keeper being the agent of the owner for the purpose only of delivering to the carrier, it must, in order to fix him with negligence, be shown that he omitted so to deliver. It will not be even primâ facie evidence against him, as it would against the carrier, that the goods never reached their destination (c).

A question frequently arises in practice, whether carriers who have received goods to be taken to a point beyond that to which their own means of conveyance extend, are liable as carriers for loss beyond that point, or are to be considered as agents for the purpose of carrying to the end of their track, and employing fresh agents at its termination to complete the journey. In such cases they are generally regarded as the carriers throughout (d). A similar quære arises when the customer does not call for the goods (e).

With regard to the remuneration to which a carrier is entitled, it is clear that he must carry for a reasonable amount; and if he insist on receiving more before conveying the goods, or before parting with them, an action for money had and received will

If there be an interchange of traffic, and, as in Gill v. The M. S. & L. Rail. Co., L. R. 8 Q. B. 186, an arrangement by which the traffic is worked as if the concerns of both were amalgamated, both or either may be sued most probably. lie against him for the excess (f). What is such reasonable amount appears to be a question for the jury (g). In like manner, if a railway company has, in disregard of s. 90 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, and s. 2 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, made unequal charges under like circumstances, and given undue preference, those who have made such higher payments under protest may recover them (h). Where the goods are of extraordinary danger, or carried under peculiar circumstances, it is in the carrier's option to insist upon a special contract (i). If such goods are tendered to a carrier, and he gives notice to the owner that he will not be responsible for loss, unless a more than ordinary rate of insurance be paid, which the owner declines to pay, but leaves the goods to be carried, it appears that the carrier receives them on the footing of such notice. If the carrier be not a railway or canal company, his liability becomes limited, and he is only bound to use the ordinary care of a bailee for reward.

Carriers have a particular lien for their charges (k). They may also by agreement, or by a custom clearly proved, have a general lien for the balance of their charges (l).

Contracts of affreightment.

CONTRACTS of affreightment, being contracts for the carriage of goods in vessels, fall under the general denomination of contracts with carriers (a). On account, however, of the important place they occupy in the mercantile law, it has been thought proper to devote a separate chapter to their consideration. Contracts of this description are either—

1. Contracts of affreightment by charterparty ; or
2. Contracts for the conveyance of goods in a general ship.

SECTION 1.—Affreightment by Charterparty.

Affreightment by charterparty.

The contract by charterparty is defined to be that "by which an entire ship, or some principal part thereof, is let to a merchant for the conveyance of goods, on a determined voyage to one or more places"(b). It may be, and more often is, a contract by which the shipowner agrees to carry goods on a specified vessel for a particular voyage or series of voyages (c). The instrument by which the contract is recorded, and which, though sometimes a deed, and almost invariably in writing (d), is not necessarily so, is generally executed by the owner of the ship, when made at the place of his residence, and sometimes by the managing owner or the master, and often by means of a broker (e). If made abroad, it can of course only be executed

(a) The carriage of passengers in merchant vessels is now regulated by stat. 18 & 19 Vict. c. 119; 26 & 27 Vict. c. 51, and 35 & 36 Vict. c. 73.

The following is a form of charterparty:—

London, 5th Nov. 1886.

OUTWARD.

This charterparty is mutually entered into between C. D. & Co. as agents for owners, and Messrs. A. B. & Co. as charterers, of the good ship or vessel Ajax, captain, Anderson, now in Hull.

The vessel is 1,395 tons net, British register, guaranteed to be made tight, staunch, strong, coppered in 1886, and in every way fitted for the voyage.

Class of vessel is 3/3rds L 11 in French veritas, and is to be so continued throughout the voyage.

The voyage to be Liverpool to Yokohama and Hiogo, or so near thereto as the vessel can safely get, where cargo is to be delivered as per bills of lading in the customary manner, so ending the voyage. The vessel to proceed with all safe speed direct to the port of discharge.

Vessel's hold and cargo capacity are given to charterers for cargo, except only what is customary and necessary for the ship's stores for the above voyage; and owners hereby guarantee the vessel to carry 1,850 tons (of 20 cwt.) weight of cargo (without being overladen), or if this be refused by owners or captain, then charterers have power to deduct the pro ratâ equivalent for such short carrying from owners' account. The weight of cargo to be computed from invoices, and from carriers' notes and from bills of lading. Either these original documents, or shippers' certificates of such weights, to be accepted as absolute proof by the owners.

The cargo to be taken on board as customary, and to be of lawful merchandise, including gunpowder (in the river), charterers erecting the necessary magazine, specie, kerosine or similar oils, acids on deck at shipper's risk; also machinery which can be shipped without cutting hatches. The vessel to proceed to any crane as required in loading dock, but any extra expense in loading or discharging packages over three tons weight to be borne by charterers.

Charter money to be paid owners is 2,058*l.*, say two thousand and fifty-eight pounds sterling, in full of all port charges, primages, &c. 1,000*l.* to be payable abroad, at current rate of exchange, by bills of lading, or charterers' order (at their option), to captain on final and true delivery of cargo; balance to be paid here in cash on sailing, less 5 per cent. for interest and insurance. Captain to have an absolute lien and charge for freight on cargo, but to have no recourse on charterers for any freight due abroad, per bill of lading, if not paid; charterers' responsibility to cease as soon as cargo is signed for, except for advance due here, and the order (if any) for balance due abroad.

Loading dock to be ordered by charterers, and to load in the river if required. Vessel to be made ready, and proceed to her loading berth as soon as possible on signing of this by the master, unless an agent of the owner be there (d); and in that case, if by deed, no action can be maintained on the charter. Provided there is not sufficient water to allow of her leaving the dock fully laden, the loading to be completed in the river.

Loading days allowed charterers are thirty, with two clear days extra for clearing; for any used for loading beyond these 14*l.* per day demurrage to be paid to owners by charterers. Sundays, customs or bank holidays, or detention by frost, are always excluded throughout this charterparty. Any day or days during which ballast is discharged not to count against charterers. Captain to notify, in writing, when vessel is in a proper loading berth as above, with the hold clear and cleaned, vessel painted, rigged, and ready for cargo. When such are complied with, loading days to commence twenty-four hours after such notice has been received by charterers. Lay days not to commence to count before 20th November, unless vessel and cargo both ready sooner; and charterers to have the option of cancelling this charterparty if vessel not arrived and ready to commence loading by 5th December.

Mate's receipts to be signed for the cargo as taken on board. On production of these, the bills of lading are to be signed by the captain at charterers' request, at any rate of freight, such bills of lading to be without prejudice to this charter. Captain shall also sign for weight of coal, pig iron, or other cargo, when weighed alongside or on board, or delivered on official weighing machine notes. Captain to attend at least once daily at charterers' office to sign bills of lading.

Stevedore to be appointed by charterers. His men are to take on board and stow the cargo under the direction of the master. The master and owners alone to be responsible for stowage of cargo and trim of vessel. Charterers to charge owners for stowage of cargo at the rate of 1*s.* 4*d.* per ton in account. Owners to pay the usual advertising, printing, and measurer's charges, not exceeding eight guineas. Underwriters' surveyors to settle all disputes as to stowage or draught, and their recommendation or decision to be carried out by captain and owners.

Dunnage or mats, if required, to be provided by owners.

Consignment of vessel to be placed in the hands of the agents appointed by the charterers, whom the owners also accept as agents of the vessel at her ports of discharge inwards, the owners paying two and a-half per cent. inwards on amount of this charter, and charterers' agents to have the preference outwards. Should the vessel put into any port or ports on the way, while under this charter, she is to be consigned to charterers' agents there.

A brokerage of five per cent. on this charter is due by owners to B., J. & Co., on signing of same.

If any disputes arise, the same to be settled by two London commercial men, each party naming one as an arbitrator, and, if necessary, the arbitrators to appoint a third. The decision of the majority shall be final, and any party attempting to revoke the submission to arbitration without the leave of a court shall be liable to pay to the other or others, as liquidated damages, the estimated amount of chartered freight. It is further agreed that these presents may be made a rule of her Majesty's High Court of Justice.

It is also further agreed that the said vessel shall, by the owners thereof, covenant against the owner, unless the party executing it had an authority by deed to do so (e). But an action may be sustained for the breach of such of the general duties of a shipowner as are not inconsistent with its terms (f); and a voyage may be made up to a certain period under a charterparty by deed, and afterwards under a parol agreement, or vice versâ (g). Whether a charterparty is signed by a person as an agent, or as a principal, is to be determined by reference to the rules already stated in regard to agency (h). The terms of a charterparty cannot, of course, be varied by parol (i), though it may, like other mercantile instruments, be explained, though not contradicted, by evidence as to the usage of trade; e.g., the well-known usages of a port (k).

during the whole of the said voyage, be kept tight, staunch and strong, and well found and provided with men and mariners, sufficient and able to navigate the said vessel, and with all manner of rigging, boats, tackle, provisions and appurtenances whatsoever (restraints of princes and rulere, the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, fire, pirates, and enemies, throughout this charterparty always excepted). In the event of war being declared between the nation to which this vessel belongs and any other, charterers have the option of cancelling the charter before the vessel proceeds to sea, upon indemnifying the owners from all consequences of re-delivering the cargo; and in case the charter be so cancelled, the charterers shall pay to the owners the sum of 13*l.* for each and every day which shall elapse between the time of the vessel being in a loading berth and the cancelling of such charter, or the final discharge of the cargo (if any) which may have been received on board, whichever last shall happen. For the due performance of the agreements and matters herein contained, each of the said parties bindeth himself and themselves, each of the other, in the sum of estimated amount of freight.

Vessel to call at a wharf in the Tees, on her way to dock, to load some iron, provided same can be done with safety to vessel, and no extra expense be incurred; if the latter, then the same to be paid by charterers.

In construing charterparties and bills of lading the governing principles are, that the intention of the parties, as apparent in the document, shall prevail (l); that, as a rule, the law of the flag of the ship shall regulate the construction of the documents (m); that they are to be read with a regard to business habits and usages (n); and that words are to be understood in their business meaning (o). Thus, to illustrate the last part of this proposition, "port" used in a charterparty will not be necessarily understood to mean the limits of a port as defined for customs or pilotage purposes, but as understood among men of business. If a vessel were required to deliver at a certain port, and it were usual to deliver part of the cargo at one place in a port and part at another, such would be the proper places of delivery (p). Or, to take an instance in which the strict grammatical construction of these documents was not followed, in Nottebohn v. Richter (q), the charterparty required the vessel to proceed to a specified port, take on board a cargo of mahogany from the bank of the river at the ship's risk, proceed, after loading, to a safe port in Europe, the act of God and other usual perils excepted, and deliver the cargo in a specified manner. According to grammatical construction the exceptions would apply only after loading; they were, however, held applicable to all the risks.

The provisions of the charterparty consist of either conditions precedent or substantive parts of the agreement, the breach of which by one party entitles the other to rescind the contract, or representations or collateral promises, the breach of which gives rise to a cause of action and a right to damages. Speaking generally, any covenant, the non-fulfilment of which will frustrate the object of the voyage, will be regarded as a condition precedent. The breach of other covenants will give rise only to actions for damages (r). In Behn v. Burness (s), the leading case on the subject, it was held that the words "now in ——" were a warranty, or a condition precedent to the contract, that the ship was then at the port named. So, in Fraser v. Telegraph Construction Co. (t), a statement "shipped on board the steamship," was held to be a condition precedent or warranty, which was broken by shipment on a vessel whose principal motive power was not steam. So, a statement that the vessel shall sail before a certain day (u), or as to the vessel's class, but not as to her being rightly classed (x).

The instrument expresses the freight to be paid, and generally the burthen of the ship; by which latter specification the parties are not however concluded, provided the excess is not unreasonable; for a merchant has been held liable on his covenant to furnish a full cargo, though he had furnished 260 tons, the specified burthen of the ship, which in reality contained 400 (y). It also comprises covenants from the owner that the ship shall be tight, staunch, furnished with all necessaries; that she shall be ready and fit by a certain day to receive (z), and shall wait a certain time to ship her cargo; shall sail at a particular time (a) for her destined port (b), "or as near thereto as she may get" (d), deliver the goods safely there, and be properly found in men and stores during the voyage, to the best of the owner's endeavours. It may, of course, comprise any other engagements which the charterer thinks proper to exact and the owner to concede; e.g., as in Nottebohm v. Richter (e), that the cargo shall be taken on board by the ship's boats and crew "at ship's risk"; that the master is to sign bills of lading without prejudice to the charterparty.

A clause is usually to be found exempting the owner from liability in case of his being prevented from performing his contract by restraint of princes. These words are not equivalent to the words "Queen's enemies," found in bills of lading, and implied by law if not there. "Restraints of princes" do not include the judgments or acts of a court of law (f). They apply to an actual (g), not a mere expected restraint, and enure to the benefit of the owner, not of the merchant; on account of which the clause is sometimes worded "restraints, &c., mutually excepted" (h). It likewise generally extends the exemption to "dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation." In order to satisfy these words, there must be an enduring, and not a mere temporary impediment to the prosecution of the voyage (i). The expression "perils of the sea" or "dangers and accidents of the sea," would include foundering by collision with another vessel. The meaning of the expression when it occurs in a policy of marine insurance was explained by Lord Herschell in The Xantho (k):—

"I think it clear that the term 'perils of the sea' does not cover every accident or casualty which may happen to the subject-matter of the insurance on the sea. It must be a peril of the sea. Again, it is well settled that it is not every loss or damage of which the sea is the immediate cause that is covered by these words.

They do not protect, for example, against that natural and inevitable action of the winds and waves which results in what may be described as wear and tear. There must be some casualty—something which could not be foreseen as one of the necessary incidents of the adventure. The purpose of the policy is to secure an indemnity against accidents which may happen, not against events which must happen. It was contended that those losses only were losses by perils of the sea which were occasioned by extraordinary violence of the winds or waves. I think that this is too narrow a construction of the words, and it is certainly not supported by the authorities or by common understanding. It is beyond question that if a vessel strikes upon a sunken rock in fair weather and sinks, this is a loss by perils of the sea; and a loss by foundering, owing to a vessel coming into collision with another vessel, even when the collision results from the negligence of that other vessel, falls within the same category. Indeed, I am aware of only one case (l) which throws a doubt upon the proposition that every loss by incursion of the sea, due to a vessel coming accidentally (using that word in its popular sense) into contact with a foreign body, which penetrates it and causes a leak, is a loss by perils of the sea."

Damage to cargo, caused by rats gnawing a hole in a pipe connecting the bath room with the sea, and the influx of water, was held to come within the exception "dangers and accidents of the seas." The loss "arose directly from the action of the sea. It was not due to tear and wear, nor to the operation of any cause ordinarily incidental to the voyage, and therefore to be anticipated" (n). The words do not protect a shipowner from liability for the negligence of the ship's master and crew (o). To avail himself of the exemption he must, in the absence of express provision, show that he has performed his duty to carry with reasonable care. Hence, a collision not caused by the fault of the carrying ship comes within the exception; it is otherwise if due to its fault (p). There seems to be no distinction in theory between the meaning of the words "dangers and accidents of the sea" in a contract of affreightment and in a policy of insurance (p). But in fact, owing to the difference in the purpose of the two contracts, the words will not protect the shipowner in circumstances in which the insurer would be liable.

The exemption, unless limited, would apply to such perils at any time after the charterparty was entered into (q). Usually the words "during the voyage" are added. Whether this phrase would include perils at the place of landing is a question as to which there have been conflicting decisions. But the authorities, on the whole, seem in favour of the opinion that it would (r).

If no time be fixed for loading or unloading, it must be performed within a reasonable time, which appears to mean "reasonable" having regard to the whole circumstances (s). Frequently the words "with all dispatch according to the custom of the port," are added. This is no more than is implied; the charter-party will be construed with reference to the custom of the port of discharge. In construing what is reasonable dispatch the number of ships and appliances is to be taken into account (ss). But the charterer usually covenants to load and unload within a specified time, called lay days (t); or if he detain the ship for a longer time, which he sometimes receives liberty to do, to pay a daily sum, which, as well as the delay itself, is called demurrage (u). The charterparty sometimes ends with a clause purporting to bind the ship's freight and cargo in a pecuniary penalty to the performance of the contract. But this seems to be inoperative (x); the party suing may, according to the nature of the breach, recover more or less than that sum (y).

The stipulations must, of course, be strictly performed on both sides. With respect to the time allowed for loading and unloading, it is held that the charterer must pay demurrage for any delay beyond the arranged period, even though not attributable to his fault, but to some unforeseen impediment to loading or unloading (z), such as the crowded state of the docks; for he has expressly engaged, and is bound by the terms of his own positive contract (a).

"The duty of providing, and making proper use of, sufficient means for the discharge of cargo, when a ship which has been chartered arrives at its destination and is ready to discharge," says Lord Selborne, L.C., in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (b), "lies (generally) upon the charterer. If by the terms of the charterparty he has agreed to discharge it within a fixed period of time, that is an absolute and unconditional engagement, for the non-performance of which he is answerable, whatever may be the nature of the impediments which prevent him from performing it, and which cause the ship to be detained in his service beyond the time stipulated. If, on the other hand, there is no fixed time, the law implies an agreement on his part to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time; that is, as was said by Mr. Justice Blackburn in Ford v. Cotesworth (c), 'a reasonable time under the circumstances.'"

Consequently, a delay of thirty-one days, owing to the absence of lighters, caused by the custom of the port, did not impose liability for demurrage on charterers bound to "discharge with all despatch according to the custom of the port" (d).

Affreightment by charterparty.

The charterer must pay demurrage though he may be unable to take delivery owing to the delay of other consignees, as in Porteus v. Watney (b), where the defendants' grain was stowed under the goods of other shippers; so, too, though he may not have been apprised of the ship's arrival (c), or the bill of lading may not have come to his hands, without which, or an indemnity, the master, as he has a right, refuses to deliver the goods (d). But where the detention was occasioned, not by any impediment to the ship's loading, but by ice (e), which prevented her from sailing after she was loaded, it was held that demurrage was not payable, since to render the freighter liable to it the delay should have been for the purpose of loading (f). And when the owners interrupted the unloading by their wrongful interference, they were not allowed to receive demurrage, though the unloading in fact occupied a greater number of days than would, under the charterparty, have been allowed, had the owners abstained from such interference (g). If a certain demurrage be agreed on for the time during which the ship may be obliged to wait for convoy, or to receive a cargo, it ceases, in the former case, as soon as the convoy is ready (h); and, in the latter, as soon as the cargo is laden and the clearances obtained (i), though the ship be longer detained by tempestuous weather, or set out and be driven into port again.

The days mentioned in the clause of demurrage were, by a special jury in London, understood to be working days (k), that is, days on which, according to the custom of the port, work is done (l); in the absence of custom, running days are taken to be meant (m). It is proper to state whether working or running days be intended (n).

Where a certain number of lay days are allowed for unloading, they are to be reckoned from the vessel's arrival, not at the entrance of the port, but at the usual place of discharge (o); to hold otherwise would be extremely inconvenient in many ports, ex. gr., that of London, which extends to Yantlet Creek (p). In Nielsen v. Wait (q), the charterparty provided that the vessel should proceed to a port in the Bristol Channel or "so near thereto as she may safely get," "eight running days, Sundays excepted, to be allowed the merchants for loading and discharging the steamer, and ten days on demurrage, &c." The vessel went to Sharpness Dock, in the Bristol Channel, which is within the port of Gloucester. She could not get nearer than Sharpness until part of her cargo was discharged. This having been done, she went through the canal to a place of discharge at Gloucester. The Court of Appeal held that a custom, in the case of vessels laden with grain of too heavy a burthen to come up the canal, to count as lay days the days occupied in part discharge, but not to count as such days the time occupied in coming up the canal, was reasonable. Nor was such a custom inconsistent with the provision in the charterparty as to "running days."

Affreightment by charterparty.

Primâ facie the loading is to be completed at the port where the vessel is ordered. In Hudson v. Ede (r), it was proved to be the custom at Sulinah, the port specified, not to load grain, but to take it from Galatz and other points higher up the Danube than Sulinah; and the Exchequer Chamber held, that where the parties excluded detention by ice from the lay days, this extended to the detention by ice between Sulinah and Galatz (s).

It would seem that each of several holders of a bill of lading may be answerable for the whole demurrage. In Straker v. Kidd and Porteus v. Watney (t), the bills of lading contained the clause, "three working days to discharge the whole cargo, or 30*l.* sterling per day for demurrage." The goods belonging to the defendant were at the bottom of the hold, under the goods of other consignees. The defendant was ready to take delivery; but owing to the goods above not being unloaded in time, he could not clear the ship within the three lay days. The defendant was held liable for the whole demurrage (u).

The substitution, by mutual consent, of a new port for that named in the charterparty, without mention of lay days, will not have the effect of depriving the merchant of the lay days stipulated for in the original contract (v).

Where the charterer fails to load within the stipulated time, the master may, of course, sail home again (x); and in that case any cargo which may have been loaded, although not the stipulated one, will go in reduction of the freight for the benefit of the merchant (y), unless, indeed, a particular sum have been agreed on as the forfeiture in case of the merchant's default; in which case, the owner would be entitled to receive that sum, and also anything more the ship might earn, even though he might thereby get a larger sum than the freight stipulated for (z).

(t) 3 Q. B. D. 223, 534.

(u) The Court supports this "startling conclusion," on the ground that "the negligence of the owners of the cargo above is not the negligence of the shipowner:" Brett, L. J., p. 543. Suppose that the shipowner or master puts the goods in such a position that by no diligence on the part of all concerned, the owners of cargo above and below, can the ship be cleared within the lay days; is there no implied duty so to stow that it shall be possible to clear within the lay days?

On the other hand, where a charterparty provided that a vessel should proceed to Trieste, and there load a full cargo, the vessel to sail from England on or before the 4th of February next, it was held, that the breach of the owner's contract to sail by that day discharged the merchant from his obligation to procure a cargo (a).

"The very words, to sail on or before a given day, import," said Tindal, C. J., "the same as the words conditioned to sail . . . . . And, looking at the subject-matter of the contract, without regarding the precise words, we think that construing the words as a condition precedent will carry into effect the intention of the parties with more certainty than holding them to be matter of contract only, and merely the ground of an action for damages. Both parties were aware that the whole success of a mercantile adventure does, in ordinary cases, depend upon the commencement of the voyage by a given time. The nature of the commodity to be imported, the state of the foreign and home market at the time the contract of charterparty is made, and the various other calculations which enter into commercial speculations, all combine to show that despatch and certainty are of the very first importance to their success; and certainly nothing will so effectually insure both despatch and certainty as the knowledge that the obligation of the contract itself shall be made to depend upon the actual performance of the stipulation which relates to them."

So, in the case of Ollive v. Booker (b), where the ship was to take in her cargo at Marseilles, after delivering her present cargo at Genoa, the Court held, that a description of her in the charterparty as "now at sea, having sailed three weeks ago," amounted to a warranty or condition precedent; and that, the ship not having sailed at that time, the charterer was discharged.

Affreightment by charterparty.

The same principle of construction was subsequently recognised and adopted by the Exchequer Chamber in Behn v. Burness (c).

Apparently, in the event of a breach by the charterer, the master is bound to endeavour to procure a cargo, so as to diminish the loss (d).

The charterer is bound to name a safe port for the discharge of the vessel (e).

Not unfrequently a stipulation is introduced into the charterparty that all liability on the part of the charterers shall cease as soon as they have shipped the cargo, or to the like effect. The following is a common form :—

"This charter being entered into on behalf of others, all liability of the parties signing to cease after shipment of cargo, in consideration of which it is agreed that for the payment of all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, the said owner shall have an absolute lien and charge on the said cargo."

Such a provision, known as the "cesser clause," is perfectly valid; and when the charterers have shipped the cargo their liability on the charterparty is at an end (f). Primâ facie, this will not extend to demurrage in the course of loading (g), but if a lien be given on the cargo for that as well as the freight, the disposition is to hold the exemption to be entire (h)—the lien on the cargo is substituted for the charterer's personal liability (i).

Affreightment by charterparty.

It often becomes important to determine whether, according to the true construction of a charterparty, the possession of the ship passes to the merchant, so as to constitute him an owner pro hâc vice, and cause the general owner to stand to him in the relation of a lessor rather than a carrier. On this question may depend the owner's right of lien for the freight, of which description of remedy we shall speak more fully hereafter (j), or his own liability to the suit of third parties (k). It is impossible, however, to lay down general rules for its solution, which must, in each case, be gathered from the terms of the instrument, or its purpose and object. Rarely in modern cases is it held that such a transfer of possession takes place. In the case of a ship let to the Commissioners of the Transport Board, the possession was held to pass to the king, on account of the nature of the service on which she was to be engaged (l). On the other hand, though the charterparty in Wagstaff v. Anderson (m) provided that the whole ship should be at the disposal of the charterers except the space necessary for the crew and stores, that the master was to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight which the charterers might require, without prejudice to the charterparty; it was held the charterers were not liable for improper sale of goods by the master. It is questionable whether the decision in the former case would now be followed. Lord Ellenborough relied much on the fact that the construction which he adopted would "enable the Crown fully and beneficially" to enjoy the use of the ship, which seems immaterial. He also said of the agreement that "it is the same thing as the hire of a waggon and team for a certain term, the proprietor stipulating that the waggon should be driven, and the horses taken care of, by his own waggoner and boy" (n).

A charterparty, or written contract for the conveyance of goods, &c. on board ship, is liable to a duty of 6*d.*, which may be denoted by an adhesive stamp. This must be cancelled by the person who last executes it, or by whose execution it is completed. If it be executed abroad, it may be so stamped within ten days after its receipt here and before it has been executed by anyone in this country, and the stamp must be cancelled. An executed instrument, not stamped, may have a stamp impressed within seven days after its execution on payment of the duty and 4*s.* 6*d.* penalty; after seven days and within one month, on payment of the duty and a penalty of 10*l.* In no other case shall the stamp be impressed (o).

Section II.—Contract for Conveyance in a General Ship.

Contract for conveyance in a general ship.

When the masters and owners of a ship engage with separate merchants to convey their goods to the place of her destination, the contract is said to be for conveyance in a general ship (p). It is usual to advertise such ship in the newspapers, or in cards and handbills; and care should be taken to insert nothing in these advertisements which it is not the shipowner's intention to make strictly good; since it is not clear that some of the terms of such advertisements may not be looked upon as incorporated into the contract (q). But the instrument to which reference is generally had for the terms of such a contract is the Bill of Lading (r).

There has been much discussion as to whether a bill of lading is a contract of affreightment or merely a receipt. It may not be the whole evidence of the contract; e. g., when advertisements have been issued by the owner and brought to the notice of the shipper, or where the terms of the charterparty are incorporated by reference. It is not evidence of the contract when the goods have not in fact been received, or the shipper never assented to the terms of the bill of lading (s). There may be an implied contract before the bills of lading are signed (t). But when the goods are put on board and the bill of lading signed, it is, in general, the evidence of the contract, and cannot be varied by parol evidence (u).

"Where there is no charterparty, as between the grantee of the bill of lading and the shipowner, the bill of lading is, no doubt, a receipt for the goods, and, as such, like any other receipt, may be controverted by evidence showing that the goods were not received; the question whether it will be more than a receipt, as between the shipper and shipowner, depends on whether the captain has received the goods, for he has no authority to make a contract of carriage to bind the shipowner, except in respect of goods received by him" (x).

The bill of lading the master, or agent generally in the case of steam-ships, signs (y), and delivers to the holder of the receipt given by him or the mate for the goods when shipped, on having (r) Bills of lading are usually signed where the vessel is chartered, but as between shipowner and charterer, they do not supersede the contract under the charterparty: Wagstaffe v. Anderson, 5 C. P. D. at p. 177.

(s) See Crooke v. Allan, 5 Q. B. D. at pp. 40, 41.

(y) As to the duty of the master, see Jones v. Hough, 5 Ex. D. 115. Often the brokers sign the bills of lading: Hayn v. Culliford, 4 C. P. D. 182.

that receipt returned to him (z). This is the usual course, and the owner will be bound only by bills of lading given in accordance with the master's usual or express authority. Therefore a master will not make the owner responsible, even to an innocent indorsee for value, by signing bills of lading for goods which have never been shipped (a).

Nor will the owner be liable to an indorsee for value if the goods are not of the quality stated.

"It is clearly impossible, consistently with that decision," said Lord Esher, M. R., in Cox v. Bruce (b), referring to Grant v. Norway (c), "to assert that the mere fact of a statement being made in the bill of lading estops the shipowner and gives a right of action against him if untrue, because it was there held that a bill of lading signed in respect of goods not on board the vessel did not bind the shipowner. . . . The doctrine of the case is not confined to the case where the goods are not put on board the ship. That the captain has authority to bind his owners with regard to the weight, condition, and value of the goods under certain circumstances may be true; but it appears to me absurd to contend that persons are entitled to assume that he has authority, though his owners really gave him no such authority, to estimate and determine and state on the bill of lading, so as to bind his owners, the particular mercantile quality of the goods before they are put on board; as for instance, that they are goods containing such and such a percentage of good or bad material, or of such and such a season's growth. To ascertain such matters is obviously quite outside the scope of the functions and capacities of a ship's captain and of the contract of carriage with which he has to do."

Of course, as in Lishman v. Christie (d), the shipowners may agree that the bills of lading shall be conclusive as to the quantity received (e).

(e) The bill of lading may be signed before the goods are actually received. "We do not say," observed the Supreme Court of the United States, in The Idaho, 3 Otto, p. 582, "that a Contract for conveyance in a general ship.

Whether the acknowledgment of the receipt of the goods would in any case be conclusive, even against the master, was for a time by no means a settled point. The statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 3, therefore provided, that—

"Every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration, representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel, shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the master or other person signing the same (f), notwithstanding that such goods or some part thereof may not have been so shipped, unless such holder of the bill of lading shall have had actual notice at the time of receiving the same, that the goods had not in fact been laden on board: provided that the master or other person so signing may exonerate himself in respect of such misrepresentation, by showing that it was caused without any default on his part, or wholly by the fraud (g) of the shipper, or of the holder, or some person under whom the holder claims."

To relieve himself from liability, the master often, especially when the goods are in packages, does not give "a clean bill of lading," but qualifies the description by saying, "contents unknown," and "not responsible for weight," "quantity and quality unknown," "weight, value, and contents unknown," or similar words. The effect of such words is to permit evidence to be given that the master was ignorant of the contents, &c., and that he delivered what was received (h).

The master will be responsible to the owner for negligence in signing a bill of lading. "He is not bound to superintend in person the receipt and stowage of the goods; but if he is not personally cognisant of the fact and time of shipment, it is his personal duty to inform himself upon both these points by an examination of the mate's receipts or of the log-book, or otherwise, before he signs a bill of lading" (i). It will be no answer to an action for negligence that a broker at a foreign port was employed by the owners to find a cargo and arrange the terms (l).

It is the practice to issue bills of lading in sets of three,—two delivered to the shipper, another retained by the owner. Should they differ, those given to the shipper would no doubt be presumed to be evidence of the contract (m). Where one part of the set has been validly indorsed, no subsequent indorsement of any other copy will affect the property in the goods (n). The fact, however, that only one of the set of a bill of lading drawn in triplicate is tendered, is no ground to a purchaser, who has agreed to pay in exchange for bills of lading, for refusing to pay (o).

There is some doubt whether a Bill of Lading, properly so called, be not confined to marine adventures; and whether an instrument so worded, given by a boat-master in a canal navigation, would operate in any way, except as a receipt or memorandum (p).

The following form contains the principal terms of a Bill of Lading in use as regards sailing-vessels:—

J. W. No. 1. a. 20. "Shipped in good order (q) by A. B., merchant, in and upon the good ship called the —— (r), whereof C. D. is master, now riding at anchor in the river Thames, and bound for Barcelona, in Spain, 20 bales, containing 100 pieces of broad cloth, marked and numbered as per margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and condition at Barcelona aforesaid (the act of God, the king's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever excepted), unto E. lading of this tenor and date; one of which bills being accomplished, the other two to stand void.
"Dated at London, the —— day of ——."

Contract for conveyance in a general ship.

But in the bills of lading actually used, especially by steamship companies, are introduced many other provisions limiting the liability of the owners.

A bill of lading should bear a 6*d.* stamp, and cannot be stamped after its execution. A person who executes an unstamped bill of lading is liable to a penalty of 50*l.* (s).

In the above form, a consignee (t) of the goods, viz., E. F., is mentioned, to whom, or to whose assigns, they are to be delivered. But the bill is sometimes made out for delivery "to —— order or —— assigns," which imports an engagement to deliver to the person whom the consignor shall nominate, and his assigns, or sometimes to the shipper himself, his order, or his assigns. If no such words appear in the bill of lading, it will be in no sense negotiable (u).

Primâ facie a delivery of goods on board a vessel, under a bill of lading in the latter form, or to the order of the vendor, though it be the vessel of the intended consignee, imports an intention on the part of the consignor, especially if he be an unpaid vendor, to reserve to himself the property in the goods, and that that shall pass by the indorsement of the bill of lading. In such case, until it has been indorsed and accepted by the indorsee, the goods remain the vendor's, so as to preserve his rights, whether as an unpaid vendor or otherwise (x); and he has a perfect right to vary their destination (y), and if payment of the price be refused, to sell them (z). But such a bill of lading is not conclusive—it merely creates a presumption (e); and it will be a question of fact, looking at the whole of the circumstances under which the shipment took place, what was the intention of the parties: whether the delivery was not really for and on account of the vendee, and the bill of lading was made out to the vendor on behalf of, and as agent for, the vendee, in which event the property will have passed and vested in the intended consignee; or whether it was not intended to preserve the rights of the unpaid vendor, until some further act was done, by transferring the bill of lading (f). In the decision of this question, the circumstance of the shipment being on board the vessel of the intended consignee, and the bill of lading being expressed to be freight free, or an invoice being sent by the consignor stating the shipment to have been made for and at the risk of the intended consignee, will be material for the consideration of the jury (g). If a bill of exchange be sent with the bill of lading, the consignee is bound to accept the bill drawn against the cargo if he retain the bill of lading, and until such acceptance the property in the goods should not pass to the consignee (h).

Other clauses than those above mentioned may be, and often are, introduced into the bill of lading, according to the nature of the contract between the parties to it. It is impossible to state here all or even many of them. The following are examples:—A clause to provide for the payment of demurrage by the consignee, the effect of which will be to raise an implied undertaking on his part to pay it, if he receive the goods under such bill of lading, and that, too, though he have no valuable interest in them; for the "acceptance of the goods in pursuance of a bill of lading, whereby the shipper has expressly made the payment of freight or demurrage a condition precedent to their delivery, is evidence of a contract by the consignee to pay such demand"(i). So, too, there may be a clause "with liberty to call at any port," which permits of calling at any port for any purpose connected with, and in furtherance of, the scope of the adventure. We shall have occasion to advert again to this subject.

It has been seen that the bill of lading is usually made out for the delivery of the goods to the order of some person, ex. gr., E. F., or his assigns. E. F. can, therefore, by naming an assign, transfer his right to them to some other person (j). The mode of appointing an assign is by indorsing and handing over (k) to him the negotiable instrument. Accordingly, it is the common practice of merchants to negotiate it, and, by such assignment, the property in the goods is held to pass to the indorsee of the bill of lading if such was the intention of the parties (l). "The bill of lading," says Bowen, L. J., in Sanders v. Maclean (m), "until complete delivery of the cargo has been made on shore to some one rightfully claiming under it, remains in force as a symbol, and carries with it not only the full ownership of the goods, but also all rights created by the contract of carriage between the shipper and the shipowner." Nay, though the consignee named in the bill of lading should become insolvent, without having paid for the goods, yet his assignment, made for a valuable consideration, and without notice to the assignee that the goods were not paid for, or that they were paid for by bills sure to be dishonoured, has been held to pass them absolutely to his assignee, and to deprive the consignor of his right to stop in transitu, which, as against the original consignee, he might have exercised (n). But if the assignee of the bill of lading have not given valuable consideration or acted bonâ fide; for instance, if he knew that the consignee was insolvent, and assisted to defraud the consignor of the price of his goods (o), he stands in the same situation as the consignee, and the consignor retains his right to stop in transitu. And, if there be any condition, either in the bill of lading or in the indorsement thereof, ex. gr., if the goods are to be delivered provided E. F. pay a certain draft, all subsequent indorsees take subject to that condition, and have no title until it is complied with (p). But although the bill of lading is so far negotiable, it is not negotiable in the sense in which a bill of exchange or promissory note is so; property does not pass by mere delivery to a bonâ fide holder for valuable consideration; it is negotiable only as a symbol of the goods. Therefore, save in cases within the Factors Act (q), delivery by a person who has improperly obtained it, or without authority from the true owner, of a bill of lading indorsed in blank to a bonâ fide transferee for value, confers no title to the goods which it represents (r). Its indorsement, too, formerly transferred no more than the property in the goods—it did not transfer the contract between the original parties to it. Therefore, the assignee of such an instrument could not maintain an action founded upon that contract (s), nor could an action founded upon it be brought against him.

This was found to be inconvenient, and therefore, by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 1, it was provided that—

"Every consignee (t) of goods named in a bill of lading, and every indorsee of a bill of lading to whom the property (u) in the goods therein mentioned shall pass, upon or by reason of such consignment or indorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit (v), and be subject to the same liabilities (w) in respect of such goods, as if the contracts contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself."

Neither at common law nor under the statute does every transfer of a bill of lading transfer a property, with the effect of making the transferee necessarily subject to all the liabilities of the transferor.

"The preponderance of principle and reason," said Earl Selborne, in Sewell v. Burdick (x)—a case in which it was sought to make the pledgees of a bill of lading liable for demurrage, &c.—"appears to me to be against the proposition that, as between those parties, it can have been intended by, or can be the effect of, the statute to make the creditor of the shipper liable (in effect) as his surety to the shipowner (with whom he was never brought in contact), by reason only of the deposit with him, by way of security, of a bill of lading indorsed in blank, his right under that deposit being (whether at law or in equity) special and not general, and the shipper retaining (whether at law or in equity) the real and substantial property in the goods, subject to the security. It had not, until the present case, been directly or indirectly determined by any authority that such is the effect of the statute."

The decision in terms applies only to a pledge; but there can be little doubt that the same result would follow if there was a mortgage (y).

Nor does the statute alter the rule that a bill of lading gives, in general, no better rights to the indorsee than the indorser himself had under the bill of lading (z). It was not intended by the statute to divest the original parties of their rights. Therefore, it is provided (a) that nothing therein contained shall prejudice or affect any right of stoppage in transitu, or any right to claim freight against the original shipper (b) or owner, or any liability of the consignee or indorsee, by reason or in consequence of his being such consignee or indorsee, or of his receipt of the goods by reason or in consequence of such consignment or indorsement. The consignee or indorsee does not, however, at all events, incur a permanent responsibility: it may be terminated by his indorsement of the bill of lading, so as to part with the property in the goods (c). But parting with the property without assigning the bill of lading will not have that effect (d).

Several parts of a bill of lading, signed by the master, are generally delivered to the shipper, and, in some instances, these parts have been indorsed to different persons; in such case, the shipmaster may deliver the goods to the first person, whether the original consignee or an indorsee, presenting one part of the bill of lading, provided, of course, the master has no notice of a prior assignment (e).

The power of thus transferring the property in the goods by an assignment of the bill of lading remains to the shipper as long as the goods are in the hands of any agent of his, and he may alter their destination while they are on board, provided the bill of lading has not been transferred; thus, if the captain sign a bill of lading for the delivery of the goods to A. or his assigns, and the shipper afterwards obtain and transmit to B. a bill of lading, making them deliverable to him, B. will be entitled to them, if nothing further had been done to vest the property in A. property in goods by means of the bill of lading continues until there has been a complete delivery under it, even though they may have been landed (g).

The above observations regarding the negotiation of the bill of lading by a consignee, apply to the case of consignment of goods to a purchaser; for where they were consigned to a factor, his power of altering the property in them, by indorsement of the bill of lading, was less extensive, since it was thought that, though he might bind his principal by a sale of the bill of lading, because a factor's usual employment is to sell, yet he could not by a pledge thereof, for that is not within the scope of his authority (h). The Factors Act, 1889, repealing 6 Geo. 4, c. 94, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39, and 40 & 41 Vict. c. 39, gives effect to his pledge also (i). The provisions are set out and commented upon ante, Book I. Chap. 5 (j).

Bills of lading may be given for goods put on board by the charterer. Usually the bill of lading contains some such words as "without prejudice to the charterparty." But even if there are no such words, the contract will be presumed to be in the charter. "As between the charterers and the shipowners," says Lord Esher, M. R., in Rodocanachi v. Milburn (k), "the bill of lading does not alter the contract between them contained in the charterparty." A holder of the bill who is merely an agent of the charterer will be in the same position as the charterer (l).

A master may give bills of lading which will in effect vary the charter as against the charterers. In Gullischen v. Stewart (m), the charterparty contained the usual provisions as to freight and demurrage, and also the cesser clause, namely, that all liability of the charterers ceased as soon as the cargo was on board. A bill of lading whereby the goods were made deliverable to themselves at the port of discharge, "they paying freight and all other conditions as per charter," was given. It was held that, notwithstanding the cesser clause, the charterers, who were consignees of the goods, were liable, as consignees, for demurrage at the port of discharge.

As between indorsees of a bill of lading, strangers to the charterer, and the person issuing the bill of lading (shipowner or charterer), the charterparty has no effect, unless its terms are distinctly incorporated. Mere notice of the existence of the charterparty will not make the indorser liable for the fulfilment of its conditions. Even when a bill of lading refers to the charterparty, the Courts are averse to making the shippers or their indorsees liable for demurrage, &c. Thus, in Chappel v. Comfort (m), decided in 1861, the words, "paying freight as per charterparty," were held not to import the terms as to lien; and in Fry v. Mercantile Bank of India (n), where the words were "freight as per charterparty," it was held that the shipowner had no lien for the whole chartered frieght as provided by the charterparty. On the other hand, the words "paying freight for the same goods and all other conditions as per charterparty," were held to import demurrage as per charter; and in Gray v. Carr (o), where the shipper took a bill of lading stating goods to be delivered as per charter to order of Carr or assigns, he or they paying freight and all other conditions or demurrage (if any should be incurred) for the goods as per charter, it was held that the holder of the bill of lading was liable, not only for the demurrage before loading, but for damages for detention beyond demurrage. No very clear rule can be laid down. As the charterparty is primarily the contract between the charterer and the shipowner, so the bill of lading is the contract between the holder of the bill of lading and the indorsee; and consequently the tendency is to import, "only those clauses of the charterparty which are applicable to the contract contained in the bill of lading (p), and those clauses of the charter cannot be brought in which would alter the stipulations in the bill of lading." Or, to quote another exposition of the law by the same judge, in Porteus v. Watney (q) :—

"I take the decision in Gray v. Carr to have been that those words in a bill of lading are to be treated as words of reference to the charterparty, and that they, therefore, introduce into the bill of lading every condition that is in the charterparty by way of reference; so that they bring into the bill of lading every condition of the charterparty in its terms, and make every one of those conditions part of the bill of lading, as if they had been originally written into it. But then there is another rule which applies, which is, that, if taking all the conditions to be in the bill of lading, some of them are entirely and absolutely insensible and inapplicable, they must be struck out as insensible; not because they are not introduced, but because, being introduced, they are impossible of application."

There is the further question, With whom in the case of a chartered vessel is the contract contained in the bill of lading, the charterer or the shipowner? The authorities seem to show:—(1) Where there is such a demise of the vessel as to make the charterer the temporary owner of the vessel and the master his agent, the charterer is responsible, as was decided in Newberry v. Colvin (r), for the performance of the contract (2) When the charter is not of that character, and the shipper is not aware of it, he is entitled to treat the contract as made with the shipowner (s). Primâ facie the master is the agent of the owner: and shippers or indorsees of bills of lading without notice of a charter will be entitled to sue the shipowner, if the bill of lading is within the ordinary authority of the master (t). Though they have notice of the charter, they may sue or be sued upon the bill of lading unless they had notice that the master had no authority to give such bill (u).

lading, that is, a bill of lading engaging to carry from A. to B. by different means of conveyance. Thus, in Moore v. Harris (h), the bill of lading provided that the goods were to be "delivered from the ship's deck, &c. into the Grand Trunk Railroad Company's trucks, then to be forwarded thence per railway to Toronto, and at the aforesaid station delivered." This was treated as one contract, binding the parties to it through the whole journey (i). As has been seen in dealing with carriers, the other companies may be liable in an action for tort (j). The authorities are not clear as to what law will govern a contract under such a bill of lading, if part of the transit is in one country and part in another. Primâ facie the law of the place where the contract was made would seem to be that applicable (k). But the intention of the parties may be that the contract shall be governed by the law of the place of performance, or that it shall at different parts of the transit be regulated by different laws (l); and effect will be given to such intention.

Section III.—Duties of Master and Owners.

Duties of master and owners.

We now come to consider the obligations which the two sorts of contracts of affreightment equally impose. These are divided by a celebrated author (m) into duties to be performed—

1. By the master and owners.
2. By the merchant.

The former class are again divided into those which respect, 1st, The preparation for; 2nd, The commencement; 3rd, The course; and 4th, The completion of the voyage.

1. Seaworthiness at Starting.—With respect to the preparation (n), the vessel must be tight, staunch, and strong, and furnished with proper necessaries and crew. This a charterparty usually requires; but it is equally required by law, though there be no bill of lading or charterparty (o). "In whatever way," said the Court, in Kopitoff v. Wilson (p), "a contract for the conveyance of merchandise be made, where there is no agreement to the contrary, the shipowner is, by the nature of the contract, impliedly and necessarily held to warrant that the ship is good, and is in a condition to perform the voyage then about to be undertaken, or, in ordinary language, is seaworthy, that is, fit to meet and undergo the perils of the sea and other incidental risks to which she must of necessity be exposed in the course of the voyage." The implied warranty is not satisfied by seaworthiness at the time when the vessel, in pursuance of the charter, takes in cargo; she must be so at the time when she sails (q); it will not avail that she is subsequently repaired (r). The same observation applies to her crew, who must be sufficient in number and ability (s). So, if usage or the law of the country require that she should have a pilot, there must be one on board; as there must also when the ship comes in the course of her voyage to any place where there is an establishment of pilots, and it is possible to procure one before she enters on the difficult part of the navigation (t). The obligation of seaworthiness is satisfied if the vessel is seaworthy at the time of starting (u). But if a vessel become unseaworthy in the course of the voyage, and she puts into port, and has an opportunity of repairing, as in Worms v. Storey (x), and she proceeds to sea without being repaired, there will be a breach of the warranty. The goods are to be taken by the master or owner, whose responsibility commences with their receipt from the shipper (y), and stored carefully on board. All things necessary for that purpose, such, for instance, as ropes, must be provided by the master, since, if the goods be injured by or in consequence of improper stowage, he and his owners are responsible (z).

Primâ facie in the absence of agreement or custom, it is the duty of the owner or master to stow. Often, however, the charter states that the charterer shall appoint a stevedore (a). In such case neither the master nor owner will be liable if the master does not in fact interfere (b). But a shipper who has not notice of the charter will, nevertheless, be entitled to sue the owner for bad stowage (c). Of course, if there is evidence that the shipper or charterer assented to the mode of stowing, as in Ohrloff v. Briscall (d), no action for improper stowage will lie. The master must have on board the proper manifest and other documents necessary for the protection of the vessel, or her admission at the port of discharge (e), and must carry no false papers or contraband goods, whereby she may be forfeited.

He must give a receipt for the cargo to the shipper, and sign bills of lading as he may direct, on having that receipt returned to him. The charterer who has put goods on board under a charterparty, by which he has the entire use of the ship, may demand their re-delivery, the payment for the hire of the vessel being independent of the delivery of cargo (g). The shipper of goods on a general ship may, by the usage of trade, if he re-demand the goods in a reasonable time before the ship sails, have them delivered back to him on paying the freight that might become due for the carriage of them, and on indemnifying the master against the consequences of any bills of lading signed for them (h). If, by agreement, the master is to proceed to a particular place (i), or in the usual form, "as near thereto as he can safely get" (k), for the cargo, he must use due diligence, or the freighter may be discharged, if the delay be such as to frustrate the object of the voyage (l); and if the vessel takes out a cargo, in which the freighter has no interest, the captain should give notice when the vessel is ready to receive the cargo, or the freighter will not be liable for omitting to provide it (m).

2ndly. Reasonable dispatch in Sailing.—With respect to the commencement and continuance of the voyage—the proper clearances being obtained (n), the ship must set sail at the stipulated time, or, if no time for sailing has been expressly agreed upon, must sail within a reasonable time; for, upon general principles in all contracts by charterparty, where there is no express agreement as to time, it is an implied stipulation that there shall be no unreasonable or unusual delay in commencing the voyage (o); and the charterer will be warranted in throwing up the charter if there has been undue or unreasonable delay, such as will defeat the object of the undertaking (p). If there be a stipulation to that effect, he must do so under the safeguard of a convoy; concerning the nature of which escort, and the rules respecting it, we treat under another head, viz., that of Insurance.

3rdly. Ship not to Deviate.—The ship having sailed must then proceed to her destined port without unnecessary delay (q) or deviation (r). If she deviate unnecessarily (at all events, where the purpose of the deviation is not to save life, and where there is no express stipulation (s)), and be lost, the master and owners are responsible, although the loss be by an excepted peril, such as the act of God or the Queen's enemies (t). It would seem, too, that this will be the case if the loss occur after, and not during deviation (u). A bill of lading stated that the vessel was "lying in the port of Fiume, and bound for Dunkirk, with liberty to call at any ports in any order, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property" (x). Instead of proceeding direct to Dunkirk, she went to Glasgow, and was lost off the mouth of the Clyde. Evidence was tendered that the shippers of the goods knew that the vessel was to proceed by way of Glasgow to Dunkirk. The evidence was declared by the Court of Appeal to be inadmissible, on the ground that, as between the indorsee of the bill of lading, by whom the action was brought, and the shipowner, the contract was contained in the bill of lading. The Master of the Rolls said:—

"If the description of the voyage had been merely from Fiume to Dunkirk, I think the contract would have been for a voyage on the ordinary sea track of a voyage from Fiume to Dunkirk, and any departure from that track, in the absence of necessity, would be a deviation. Of course, when I speak of the ordinary sea track, I do not mean an exact line, for it would necessarily vary somewhat according to circumstances; the ordinary track for sailing vessels would vary according to the wind; the ordinary track for a steamer, again, might be different from that for a sailing vessel. I mean the ordinary track of such a voyage according to a reasonable construction of the term. In the present case, liberty is given to call at any ports in any order. It was argued that that clause gives liberty to call at any port in the world. Here, again, it is a question of the construction of a mercantile expression used in a mercantile document, and I think that as such the term can have but one meaning, namely, that the ports, liberty to call at which is intended to be given, must be ports which are substantially ports which will be passed on the named voyage. Of course, such a term must entitle the vessel to go somewhat out of the ordinary track by sea of the named voyage, for going into the port of call in itself would involve that. For 'call' at a port is a well-known sea term; it means to call for the purposes of business generally, to take in or unload cargo or to receive orders; it must mean that the vessel may stop at the port, or call for a time, or else the liberty to call would be idle. I believe the term has always been interpreted to mean that the ship may call at such ports as would naturally and usually be ports of call on the voyage named. If the stipulation were only that she might call at any ports, the invariable construction has been that she would only be entitled to call at such ports in their geographical order, and therefore the words 'in any order' are frequently added. But in any case, it appears to me that the ports must be ports substantially on the course of the voyage" (y).

The master is to use every effort to convey the cargo safely to its destination; and if, by reason of a storm, or some other unexpected cause the cargo is damaged or it becomes impossible to carry it on in his own vessel, he is to do what a prudent man would think most for the benefit of all concerned (z). He must, if possible, communicate with the owner before selling (zz). We have high authority for saying that,

"Transhipment for the place of destination, if it be practicable, is the first object, because that is in furtherance of the original purpose (a); if that be impracticable (b), return or a safe deposit (c) may be expedient. The merchant should be consulted, if possible (d). A sale is the last thing that the master should think of, because it can only be justified by that necessity which supersedes all human laws. If he sells without necessity, his owners as well as himself will be answerable to the merchant (e); and they will be equally answerable if he places the goods at the disposal of a Vice-Admiralty Court in a British colony, and they are sold under an order of the Court, such Court having no authority to order a sale (f). And the persons who buy under such circumstances will not acquire a title as against the merchant (g), but must answer to him for the value of the goods" (h).

The shipowner, being at liberty to tranship, will be entitled to freight if he, within a reasonable time, conveys the goods to their destination in a substituted ship (i); and it matters not that he has paid less freight than that which the cargo-owner agreed to pay. If the shipowner delivers the goods short of the port of destination, he will not be entitled to freight pro ratâ: he must "show a dispensation or a new contract" (k). The master's authority extends to hypothecate the cargo, or even sell a part of it where it is necessary to do so, for repairs, in order to the preservation of the entire venture (l). If he do the former, the owner must indemnify the merchant (m); and if he do the latter, the merchant, on the ship's safe arrival at the place of destination, will have a right to receive what the goods would have fetched if brought thither (n), or may elect to take the sum they actually sold for, and may in that case, if he please, deduct it from the freight payable (o). "The shipper," said Brett, J., in Hopper v. Burness (p), "has an option to treat the proceeds of the sale as a loan; or he may say, 'You have sold my goods against my will, and though by the maritime law that is not a wrongful sale, still I am entitled to and claim an indemnity against any loss occasioned by the sale.' . . . . 4thly. On the completion of the voyage, the master must have the vessel properly moored, report his ship and crew, exhibit his manifest and other papers to the proper officers, and deliver up the cargo to the consignee named in the bill of lading, or the indorsee, on payment (r) of the freight and other charges in respect thereof. These other charges are generally primage and average, the nature whereof will presently be stated; and the master need not, in general, part with the goods till they are liquidated. If, indeed, it appear from the bill of lading that the freight or other charges have been paid (s), he is estopped from claiming them as against the assignee of such bill of lading (t); nor can he detain the goods of one person for charges upon those of another, though he may any part of what is consigned to one and the same person for the charges upon it all (u). Nor will he be able to sue for primage if the goods be received under a charterparty, the terms of which exclude primage (x).

The manner of delivering up the goods, and consequently the period at which the master ceases to be responsible for them, depends, in the absence of agreement, on the custom of the place (y). In the absence of any custom upon the subject, the consignee's right has been decided to be to have reasonable time and opportunity for coming and receiving them from the ship's side (z). The consignee must, in the absence of a special agreement, discharge the vessel with reasonable dispatch (a). If the consignee send a lighter for the goods, the master must, by the custom of the river Thames, watch them in the lighter till it is fully laden (b), but not afterwards (c). In the case of a transferable bill of lading, if it be not produced, the master, after waiting a reasonable time, may deliver the goods to a third person to keep till it is produced (d).

In consequence of the difficulties to which a shipowner was subjected in the case of goods imported from foreign parts, peculiar powers have been conferred on him by statute (e). If the owner of such goods "fails (f) to make entry thereof," or having made entry, to land or take delivery of them at the time appointed by the charterparty or bill of lading, or if no time be specified, within seventy-two hours after the ship is reported, the shipowner is enabled to make entry of, land the goods, and place them in a wharf or warehouse, and give the wharfinger or warehouse keeper notice of his lien, for which they may be retained (g). They then may be detained, not only for this lien but also for rent, and in the event of the lien not being paid or deposit made for it, the wharf or warehouse owner, if required by the shipowner, is to sell (h) at the expiration of ninety days from the time of their deposit with him, or if the goods be perishable, at an earlier period at his discretion. Notice of this sale is to be published, and also given to the owner of the goods if he be known. The freight and other charges may then be deducted from the proceeds (i). In cases to which the Merchant Shipping Act does not apply, i.e., goods not imported, the shipowner ceases, if the consignee does not take delivery, to hold them as carrier; he is liable only as a warehouseman (k).

All the duties which the law has thus imposed upon shipowners, at all events when common carriers, and their agents are, after all, no more than consequences of the general rule before stated respecting carriers (kk), viz., that they are responsible at common law for everything, except the act of God (l) and the Queen's enemies, and wear and tear, or natural decay and deterioration of goods (m). law liability, is usually narrowed by their own express stipulations in the charterparty or bill of lading, and has also been qualified by the intervention of the legislature.

The bill of lading contains, as we have seen, these words: "the act of God or the Queen's enemies (n), fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever, excepted" (o). The first two of these were, as we have seen, exceptions, even at common law. The third is made so by stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 503, which enacts (p), that no owner of any sea-going ship, or share therein, shall be liable to make good any loss or damage which may happen without his actual fault or privity of or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever, taken in or put on board any such ship, by reason of any fire happening on board such ship.

In this clause the master is not mentioned, and it may therefore be doubtful whether his responsibility is in this case removed by the statute; but the insertion of the word "fire" in the bill of lading certainly removes it (q). "Fire" means fire on board the vessel; it does not extend to fire on board a lighter on which goods have been placed for the purpose of landing them (r). The exception "fire on board" would not exempt the shipowner from liability for general average for loss by water being poured on the cargo to extinguish a fire (s).

An injury by rats is not a danger or accident within this ordinary exception in the bill of lading, unless it led to sea damage; and the owner has been held liable for such damage, even though he had cats on board (t). He was also, like an ordinary carrier, liable for the felonious acts of his servants or strangers. Whence it has become not unusual to extend the exception to the acts of robbers, and sometimes thieves. But the former has been held not to apply to thefts without force (u), and the latter not to thefts by persons belonging to the ship (x).

The shipowner's contract in the case of a bill of lading, says Willes, J., in Grill v. General Iron Screw Colliery Co. (y), "is to carry with reasonable care, unless prevented by the excepted perils." Before he can avail himself of the exceptions, he must have acted with "reasonable care," and he will be responsible for the result of these, or other like excepted causes, if the loss happen through the fault of himself or the master (z). Thus, damage in consequence of a collision from negligence, or barratry of the crew (a), or bad stowage (b), or defective fastening of the ports (c), or deviation (d), are not within the exceptions (e).

The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, also enacts (f) that no owner of any sea-going ship, or share therein, shall be liable to make good any loss or damage that may happen without his actual fault or privity of or to any gold, silver, diamonds, watches, jewels, or precious stones, taken in or put on board any such ship, by reason of any robbery, embezzlement, making away with or secreting thereof, unless the owner or shipper thereof has, at the time of shipping the same, inserted in his bills of lading, or otherwise declared in writing to the master, or owner, of such ship, the true nature and value of such articles. It is sufficient to describe the article by the ordinary name, and the value by the coin of the place of shipment (g). The section does not extend to foreign ships (h). It is the duty of shippers of goods of a dangerous character, or unsuitable for carriage, of the defects of which the shipowner cannot be aware, to give notice to the master, otherwise they will be answerable for the probable consequences of their omission (i).

Being frequently an insurer of the goods, the shipowner was also liable, though damage to them had resulted from the misconduct of a pilot, whom he was compelled to take on board (j); the stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 388, therefore, enacts that no owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the default or incapacity of any qualified pilot in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law (k). The above enactment does not require that the pilot should be compulsorily employed where the accident happened, but only that he should have been compulsorily employed within the district where it happens (kk). If the mischief arise partly from the neglect or misconduct of the master or crew, the owner is liable (l).

Such are the exemptions from liability conferred by this statute. It likewise contained a limitation of the amount of the shipowner's responsibility (m), which, however, has been repealed; and now (n) the owners of any ship, whether British (o) or foreign, without whose actual fault or privity the event has occurred (p), shall not—

"Where any damage or loss is caused to any goods, merchandise or other things whatsoever on board any such ship . . . . be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together with loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things, to an aggregate amount exceeding 15*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage, nor in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be, in addition, loss of life or personal injury, or not, to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage"(q).

This tonnage, in case of sailing ships, is to be the registered tonnage, and in case of steamers, the gross tonnage (r). In the case of foreign ships, they are to be measured, where practicable, by English measurement. The owners also are liable (s), in respect of loss or damage arising on distinct occasions (t), to the same extent as if no other loss or damage had arisen. If several claims are made or apprehended, an owner may apply (u), admitting his liability (v), to the Court (x) for the purpose of determining the amount, and distributing it rateably among the claimants, and staying any other proceedings. All sums paid in respect of losses or damage as to which the responsibility is thus limited, and all costs incurred, may be brought into account among the part owners as money disbursed for the use of the ship (y).

It will be observed, that only one of these sections contains any provision in favour of the master, viz., in the case of damage arising from the fault of the pilot. The exemption thus granted is unqualified in its terms; but so far as the provisions in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, as to the limitation of liability of shipowners, are concerned, it is declared (z), that nothing contained in those provisions shall be construed to lessen or take away any liability to which any master or seaman, being part owner of the ship, may be subject in his capacity of master or seaman (a).

Beyond these statutory exemptions, to use the language of Lord Ellenborough (b), with reference to contracts of affreightment, "no exception (of a private nature at least), which is not contained in the contract itself, can be engrafted upon it by implication as an excuse for its non-performance;" and therefore a seizure and condemnation of goods as contraband in particulars he will be liable to make good the injury sustained in consequence, and in the last he will be subject to severe penalties, and the goods may be refused, or thrown overboard, or forfeited (k). He must also pay the charges due on his commodities. These are usually primage, average, demurrage, and freight.

Primage was originally a small customary payment to the master for his care and trouble. In practice it is generally treated as a part of the freight (l).

Average denotes several petty charges, such as towage, beaconage, &c., which it would be difficult and useless to enumerate (m); there is a more important charge called General Average, of which we shall treat in the next section.

Demurrage has been already spoken of (n).

Freight is the payment made for the conveyance of the merchandise (o) to its destination. It denotes the price of carriage, not of receiving goods to be carried; and, therefore, though a merchant may, of course, contract to pay a sum of money to a shipowner for taking goods on board, yet such payment is not, strictly speaking, freight (p). Nor, as a rule, is a sum to be paid before the expiration of the voyage freight. Freight may, however, be advanced, and such a sum is irrecoverable, though the ship and goods are lost, and the freight is not earned (q). On the other hand, a sum advanced as a loan upon the security of freight is recoverable (r). But if the advance be a part of the freight, it is by English law irrecoverable. Whether an advance be a loan or of the nature of freight is to be determined by reference to the charterparty or the conduct of the parties. The circumstance that the charterer insures such an advance is strong evidence that it is on account of freight, and that it cannot be recovered (s).

"Dead freight," which is often spoken of as payable by the merchant, is a conventional inaccurate expression, signifying "unliquidated compensation for loss of freight," arising, for instance, from short delivery (t).

It follows, from the above definition, that no freight becomes due, unless the carriage of the goods be completely performed (u); e.g., if the cargo has not been carried to its destination (v). If the voyage be not completed, though from causes excepted in the contract, the freight will not be due (w). In consequence of this rule, when a ship has been engaged to sail from one port to another, as from A. to B. and back again, it often becomes important to know whether this employment is to be looked upon as consisting of one or of two distinct voyages; since if the ship be lost after her transit from A. to B., but before that from B. back to A. has been completed, freight will, by adopting the latter construction, be due for the carriage from A. to B., but not by adopting the former. In solving this question, the Court must be guided by the intention of the parties, as collected from the words and subject-matter of the agreement (x).

A part payment of freight may sometimes be claimed: this happens in some cases in which only part of the cargo is delivered, or part only of the voyage is performed. In the former case, if the ship were a general one, or if she were chartered for freight to be paid according to the quantity of the goods, freight is due for as much as is delivered (y). But if a ship chartered at a specific sum for the voyage, without reference to the quantity of goods, were to lose part of her cargo, it has been doubted whether freight would be payable for the remainder (z).

If the merchant, having the option of having his goods sent on, prefer receiving them where they are, he must pay freight pro ratâ itineris peracti (a). And this, not on the original contract of affreightment, upon which the owner, if obliged to sue, must not proceed, but under a new one, which the law implies from the merchant's behaviour (b).

And if there were any circumstances whence it could be inferred, such for instance, as an acceptance by the freighter of the remaining portion of the cargo, a new contract to pay freight pro ratâ might be held to arise by implication (c). But the mere circumstance that the owner of the goods accepted them at the intermediate port will be no proof of a new contract (d).

If the master, being at too great a distance from the merchant to consult him, and, acting for the best, direct a sale, having good grounds to believe it necessary, it was thought by some that there was no reason why an implied contract to pay freight pro ratâ should not arise on the merchant's receiving the proceeds, as it certainly will where the goods are seized, and sold by a competent prize court under a sentence which is afterwards reversed, and the proceeds restored (e). It has, however, long been decided that no such contract arises (f). "A sale under such circumstances," said Lindley, L. afterwards by claiming the proceeds of sale, is not enough by English law to render distance freight payable; see Hopper v. Burness (g), and the cases there cited. To have that effect the circumstances must be such as to give the owner an option of having his goods sent on to their destination, or of accepting them at an intermediate port. If, having that option, he accepts the goods at the intermediate port he is bound to pay pro ratâ freight." If the master sell without necessity, or refuse to forward the goods to their destination, no freight is due (h). And as, in the absence of express stipulation, the voyage does not commence till the ship has broken ground, her owners, if she be prevented from sailing, are entitled to no compensation for work already done, such as loading the goods on board (i). Duties of the shipper.

The owner will not lose his freight in consequence of an interruption, without his fault, of the voyage, which is afterwards completed, such as a capture and re-capture (k). If the ship and cargo be taken, re-taken, and carried by the re-captors into a port short of its destination, and there, in consequence of some legal doubt or of the merchant's delay, the ship be restored before the cargo, the owners need not wait to convey the latter to its destination, but are entitled to the freight subject to salvage (l).

Freight, strictly speaking, cannot exist if a person carries his goods in his own ship; and though a purchaser or mortgagee of a ship acquires a right to freight earned, he will have no claim against the owner for the carriage of his goods (m).

Where goods are sent in a general ship, the amount of freight depends on the agreement of the parties (n), or the value of the service performed, estimated according to the usage of trade in like cases (o). If there be a charter-party, and a gross sum is to be paid for the whole or part of a ship, it becomes due although the merchant do not provide a complete lading, or part of the cargo be lost by excepted perils (p). If the payment be so much per ton, it must be calculated on the number of tons the ship or part thereof contains; not on the number mentioned in the description in the charter-party (q), or the quantity of goods laden on board. If the payment be so much per quarter or cubic ton of the goods, this is to be calculated on the quantity loaded and carried, not on that discharged (r). Accordingly, where the cargo has swelled or shrunk, in the absence of usage or agreement, freight is payable on the quantity shipped (s). On the other hand, if the master improperly refuse to take the entire quantity of goods agreed on, he will, nevertheless, if the payment was to be per cask or bale, have a right to a compensation for what he has carried (t); as he will, in case of his deviating (u), or sailing with his ship out of repair (x), or not sailing according to stipulation with the first wind or convoy (y); the rule being, as stated by Lord Ellenborough (z), that "unless the non-performance alleged in breach of the contract goes to the whole root and consideration of it, the covenant broken is not to be considered as a condition precedent, but as a distinct covenant, for the breach of which the party injured may be compensated in damages."

The circumstance that the goods carried are injured, or that the consignee may be entitled to damages against the shipowner or mortgagee, does not deprive the shipowner of his right to freight if the goods have been substantially carried (p). "If he carry part," said Willes, J., in Dakin v. Oxley (q), "but not the whole, no freight is payable in respect of the part not carried, and freight is payable in respect of the part carried unless the charter-party made the carriage of the whole a condition precedent to the earning of any freight—a case which has not, within our experience, arisen in practice." Duties of the shipper.

If the agreement be to pay so much per month, week, or other aliquot part of the voyage, the merchant takes the risk of its duration, and the freight will begin to run against him from the day the ship breaks ground, and continue to do so, not only while she is at sea, but during any unavoidable delay which does not suspend the contract, ex. gr., for repairs, blockade, or embargo (r). But if the agreement be in any other form, the owner takes the risk of the duration of the voyage, and is only entitled to the same amount, however long it may continue. If refused payment of freight the shipowner may bring back the goods to their destination. He may land and warehouse them in his own warehouse, or warehouse them in accordance with 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, ss. 66—78 (s). This point is so important that we quote the judgment of the Privy Council in Cargo ex Argos (t).

"Not merely is a power given, but a duty is cast on the master in many cases of accident and emergency to act for the safety of the cargo in such manner as may be best under the circumstances in which it may be placed; and as a correlative right, he is entitled to charge its owner with the expenses properly incurred in so doing. Most of the decisions have related to cases where the accident happened before the completion of the voyage; but their Lordships think that it ought not to be laid down that all obligation on the part of the master to act for the merchant ceases after a reasonable time for the latter to take delivery of the cargo has expired. It is well established that, if the ship has waited a reasonable time to deliver goods from her side, the master may land and warehouse them at the charge of the merchant; and it cannot be doubted that it would be his duty to do so rather than to throw them overboard. In a case like the present, where the goods could neither be landed nor remain where they were, it seems to be a legitimate extension of the implied agency of the master to hold that, in the absence of all advices, he had authority to carry or send them on to such other place as in his judgment, prudently exercised, appeared to be most convenient for their owner; and if so, it will follow from established principles that the expenses properly incurred may be charged to him."

The owner has a lien on the goods until the freight is paid, if he do not agree to waive it (x), have not lost it by conduct inconsistent with its continuance (y), or have not framed his charter-party in such a manner as to part with the possession of the vessel to the charterer (z). This right he will retain against the charterer or his agent with notice of the charter, though bills of lading be signed making the goods deliverable on payment of less freight (a). But as against assignees or consignees who have purchased or made advances on the faith of the bill of lading without notice of the charter-party, he can only retain the goods for the freight mentioned in the bill of lading (b). It has been held, even in case of a charter-party by which part of the freight was payable during the voyage and the rest by bills at two and four months' date from the day of the arrival of the ship in the Thames on her homeward voyage, that the charterer, having failed before the ship's return, the owner might insist on retaining a lien on the goods for his freight (e). But it would seem that, in the absence of special agreement, there is no lien for freight due before delivery. The lien, too, is sometimes extended to dead freight and demurrage, but this must be by agreement The shipowner has not, in the absence of a general usage, a right to a general lien (d).

Whether the shipowner exercise that right or no, he may sue the charterer upon his contract to pay freight (e). When there is no charter-party, a contract to pay freight may generally be inferred from the fact of shipment (f); though the shipper may be freed from liability by the express terms of the bill of lading, or by delivery of a bill of lading, with an indorsement freeing the shipper (g). Where a bill of lading expressed goods to be consigned on account and risk of William Beckford, to Messrs. P. & W. or their assigns, they paying freight, the owner had a right to sue the consignor, Beckford, for freight in the absence of any evidence of a custom among merchants to the contrary. This appears to be the effect of the Bills of

In Campion v. Colvin, the Court appears to rest its decision on the ground of special agreement, rather than on the general right of lien. "Looking," says Tindal, C. J., "to the intention of the parties, it is clear the shipowner meant to insist on the delivery of the bills before the delivery of the cargo; so that with respect to the time at which the freight was payable, there is no difference between this and the preceding cases." And see Alsager v. St. Katherine's Dock Company, 14 M. & W. 794, where it was held there was no lien for freight, it having been made payable "in cash two months after the vessel's inward report;" though another clause provided that the ship should deliver her cargo "on being paid freight," at 4*l.* per ton, and the charterer had become bankrupt. So in Tanvaco v. Simpson, 19 C. B. N. S. 453; L. R. 1 C. P. 363; where bills had been given which had been dishonoured.

It might, however, be otherwise if the consignment were from vendor to vendee. (See Barker v. Havens, 17 Johns. 284, cited M. & M. 157, in notis.) In such a case, it might be urged that the consignor, in employing the shipowner, acted as agent for the consignee (see Freeman v. Birch, 1 N. & M. 420); and perhaps Domett v. Beckford, and the opinion of Lord Tenterden in Drew v. Bird, might, if this distinction were adopted, prove not completely irreconcileable.

Duties of the shipper.

Lading Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), which states (sect. 2) that nothing in the Act shall affect any right to claim freight against the original shipper or owner. Where the goods were deliverable to assigns on paying freight, and the consignees indorsed to C. & Co., their agents, who obtained the goods, it was held, before the Bills of Lading Act, that the consignees were not liable for freight (h); the plaintiffs had debited C. & Co. with the freight.

At common law the consignee or the indorsee of the bill of lading may be sued if he have received the goods in pursuance of a bill of lading, imposing the payment of freight or demurrage upon him (i). "Where a cargo," said Parke, B., in Young v. Moeller (j), "is received under a bill of lading, that, though not necessarily raising a contract in law, is evidence from which a jury may infer a contract to pay freight in consideration of the captain giving up his lien on the goods." But if the consignee appears upon the face of the bill of lading to be a mere agent, no contract to become personally liable for freight can at common law be implied from his receipt of the goods under it (k). Nor was the acceptance of the goods of itself sufficient to impose charges in respect of them, although other circumstances concurring with acceptance may (l); such, for instance, as the previous dealings of the parties (m). And if there be only a bill of lading the law will not, from his mere receipt of goods under the bill of lading, (h) Tobin v. Crawford, 9 M. & W. 716. In Lewis v. M'Kee, L. R. 2 Ex. 37; 4 Ex. 58, the consignee had indorsed the bill of lading to "W. & K. or order, &c., looking to them for all freight, &c." But there was no proof of assent by the plaintiffs discharging the consignees.

That is evidenced in ordinary cases by the bill of lading. I accede, also, to the decision in Wilson v. Kymer (supra), that the same evidence may be deduced from the previous dealings between the parties."

raise an implied promise from an indorsee to pay freight or charges (n), though it is evidence of such a promise, which may be submitted to the jury, and on which they may find it (o). But if there be a charter-party containing an express contract by the charterer to pay freight, referred to in the bill of lading, it is questionable whether, apart from the Bills of Lading Act, a jury would be warranted in finding an agreement on the part of the consignee or indorsee to pay freight, as the reference in the bill of lading may have been introduced simply for the purpose of keeping the charter-party unvaried, and preserving the lien for freight under it (p); and it is clear that the mere acceptance of goods under a bill of lading, making them deliverable to the consignee, "paying for the goods as per charter-party," does not render him liable for demurrage at the port of loading stipulated for by the charter-party (q).

Now the Bills of Lading Act, 1855 (r), s. 1, enacts that—

"Every consignee of goods named in a bill of lading, and every indorsee of a bill of lading to whom the property (s) in the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon or by reason of such consignment or indorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods, as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself."

Apparently these words would include freight to be paid in advance, but not actually so paid (t).

There are some cases in which an utter stranger to the contract may become chargeable with freight. Thus, if a neutral vessel, laden with the goods of one of two belligerents, be captured by the other, the ship is to be restored, and the goods confiscated, the captor paying the full freight; for he has by his own act put himself in the place of the consignee with respect to the goods, and waived the completion of the voyage (x). But this is only where the goods are such as a neutral ship may, by the law of nations, carry (y). On the other hand, if the ship be hostile, and the goods those of a neutral, the captor is entitled to the freight, if he convey them to their destination, but not otherwise (z).

If the ship, having performed part of her voyage, be disabled from completing the remainder, the master may, as we have seen, tranship the goods in order to convey them to their destination. In that case it was long a question whether the remainder of the voyage, after the transhipment, was to be considered as performed under the old contract or under a new one, and whether the remuneration was to be at the rate of freight originally contracted for, or on a quantum meruit. It is, however, now settled, that if the goods be conveyed safely to their destination, the freight paid shall be that originally contracted for. That was decided in Shipton v. Thornton (a), where goods shipped on board the James Scott at Singapore for London, under bills of lading to one Merchant, were, under circumstances of necessity, transhipped at Batavia into the Mountaineer and Sesostris under bills of lading to one Ellward or assigns. The goods arrived safe. Ellward indorsed the bills to Merchant, and he received the goods. And it was held that he was liable to the original freight as per James Scott, not to the freight as per James Scott to Batavia only, and then to the rates (which were smaller) as per Mountaineer and Sesostris.

"It may be taken," said the Court, "to be either the duty or the right of the shipowner to tranship. If it be the former, it must be so in virtue of his original contract; and it should seem to result from a performance by him of that contract, that he will be entitled to the full consideration for which it was entered into, without respect to the particular circumstances attending its fulfilment. If it be the latter, a right to the full freight seems to be implied. The master is at liberty to tranship: but for what purpose, except for that of earning his full freight at the rate agreed on?" Duties of the shipper.

And the full freight will be due though, in fact, the shipowner has procured them to be conveyed at a less freight than that agreed for in the charter or bill of lading.

There was a question incidentally mooted in Shipton v. Thornton (i), on which the language of the judgment is important, viz.:—If the transhipment can only be effected at a higher than the original rate of freight, which party is to stand to the loss? The opinion of the Court appeared to be, that, in such case, the master's right to tranship would be at an end; but that he would become the freighter's agent to do what was most for his benefit under the circumstances; and that, consequently, if it were for the freighter's advantage that the goods should be forwarded and an increased rate of freight incurred, the freighter would be bound by his agreement to pay such increased rate (j). The effect of the authorities appears to be that the freighter will not be bound unless communication with him was impossible, and unless it was reasonable under the circumstances to forward the goods at the higher freight.

Where advance freight has been paid no portion of it is recoverable (k), though the goods or ship be lost.

Space does not permit stating the other duties of the charterer, but it may be mentioned that if the charterer is required to name a port of delivery he must do so with reasonable diligence, and will be answerable in damages if he fails (l). The port named must be safe, having regard to the vessel and the cargo (m). The master is not bound to lighten. When, as in Dahl v. Nelson (n), the charter-party required the vessel to proceed to certain docks, or "so near thereunto as she may safely get," it was held that, in the circumstances, the shipowner had satisfied the obligation by proceeding to the dock gates. The docks being full, the ship could not get a discharging berth, and the dock authorities refused to allow her to enter. "The legal effect of the contract," said Lord Blackburn (o), "in my opinion, as far as regards the shipowner is, that he binds himself that his ship shall (unless prevented by some of the excepted perils) proceed to the discharging place agreed on in the charter-party. That is, in this case, the Surrey Commercial Docks (which must, I think, mean inside the docks), with an alternative 'or so near thereto as she may safely get and lie always afloat.' The legal effect, as regards the obligation on the merchant, is, I think, that he binds himself, on the ship arriving at the place where it is to deliver, to take the cargo from alongside, and for that purpose to provide the proper appliances for taking delivery there. If, as both parties wished and expected, it got to a discharging berth within the dock, the merchant was, by himself, or the dock company as his agents, to provide proper means for landing the cargo on the quay. If the ship may not get safely further than the entrance of the docks, and is entitled to require the merchant to take delivery in the river (which is what, it is said by the plaintiffs, has happened in this case), the merchant must provide lighters or other craft to take the cargo from alongside, unless it is arranged by the parties that, instead, it should go into some other dock."

Section V.—General Average.

General average.

There are two charges which frequently accrue during the prosecution of the adventure, and fall sometimes on the merchant, sometimes on the owner, and sometimes on both: these are, general average (s) and salvage.

Whenever damage or loss is incurred by any particular part of the ship or cargo, for the preservation of the rest (t), it is called General Average: that is, the several persons interested in the ship, freight, and cargo, shall contribute their respective proportions to indemnify the owner of the particular part against the damage which has been incurred for the good of all (u). But the damage must be for the general good, or to avert a common danger (x); and, consequently, in order that there may be a general average, the whole adventure, that is, ship and cargo, must have been in jeopardy. The peril, too, must have been imminent. The general average loss need not, however, consist in the actual loss or injury of the subject-matter in respect of which average is claimed; it may be any expense incurred with relation to it for the common good, e.g., money paid for salvage services (y), voluntary stranding to avoid total loss (z). In recent times, the chief controversy has been as to expenses incurred by a vessel putting into a port of refuge. No difficulty arises where the vessel puts in to repair original defects; expenses so incurred are not the subject of general average. But when the vessel takes refuge to avoid a common peril, the authorities are agreed that the pilotage, towing and other expenses of going in are general average expenses (a). Probably, too, the necessary expenses of coming out are to be so treated, if the vessel put into port owing to a general average act, and if "the going into port, the unloading, warehousing, and reloading of the cargo, and the coming out of port," were parts of one operation for the common safety (b). The discharge of the cargo in the port of refuge, if reasonable, having regard to the safety of the ship, will form a general average expenditure (e). According to the decision of the House of Lords in Svensden v. Wallace (f), the expense of reloading after the repairs are effected is not the subject of a general average, though the cargo was reasonably and properly, for the safety of the ship, discharged (g). It is to be observed that, in that case, the original damage, to repair which the vessel put into port, was accidental, and not the subject of general average.

(t) The definition in the text is a curtailed statement of the definition of general average given by Lawrence, J., in Birkley v. Presgrave, 1 East, 220, which was as follows: "All loss which arises in consequence of extraordinary sacrifices made, or expenses incurred, for the preservation of the ship and cargo, come within general average." Compare the following definition by Brett, L. J., in Whitecross Wire Co. v. Savill, 8 Q. B. D. at p. 662: "If there is an imminent danger, and if the captain sacrifices part in order to save the rest of the adventure, a claim for a general average contribution arises." General average.

D. 362, the question was whether specie, part of the cargo of a vessel, was subject to average contribution in these circumstances: the vessel ran aground and the specie was landed; afterwards the master jettisoned part of the cargo, and she was enabled to complete her voyage. Held, that the specie was not liable to contribute.

The loss or expense must have been voluntarily incurred; there must be some sacrifice. The cutting or casting away of something which must be lost by reason of its state, even if the whole adventure be saved, gives no claim to contribution (h). Masts and sails destroyed in consequence of carrying an unusual press of canvas, are not subjects of general average (i), though if so cut away and abandoned for the preservation of the ship, they are (k). Nor will the ordinary use of the vessel's tackle, engines, &c., be matter of general average.

If a ship be obliged to put into port to repair damage, and the master be compelled to hypothecate or sell a part of the cargo to enable him to effect the repairs and prosecute the voyage for the common benefit, the value of that does not form a subject for general average (l); it is not enough that the voyage is impeded; the ship and cargo must be imperilled. It is not settled whether, if a ship be obliged to go into port for necessary repairs, for acts the subject of general average, the wages of the seamen during the delay are subject of average (m). According to the majority of English authorities, Hall v. Janson (n) being the chief exception, general average includes, not all expenses necessary to bring the voyage and common adventure to a successful issue, but only sacrifices and expenditures for the common safety of vessel and cargo (o).

The injury done to a ship, the ammunition lost, or the expense of healing sailors wounded in action with the enemy, is not reimbursed, according to our law, by a general average (p).

General average.

The owners of deck cargo, if jettisoned, are not entitled to average contribution, unless such cargo is permitted to be carried according to an established custom, or by the consent of the other owners of cargo (q). Nor are wrongdoers whose default led to the jettison so entitled (qq).

It is no answer to a claim on a general average bond or an average contribution that the ship was unseaworthy. But if the loss was occasioned by the unseaworthiness, it would be a defence (r).

Speaking generally, "property," says Wills, J., in Royal Mail Steam Packet Company v. English Bank of Rio de Janeiro (s), "whether ultimately saved or jettisoned, actually at risk at any time during which the operation causing loss has been going on (comprehending under that phrase all such acts as may be properly considered as forming together one whole), is liable to contribution; provided that in consequence of that operation the whole adventure be preserved from destruction; because, if it was not at risk during any part of that time, no adventure of which it formed one of the constituents was saved by the operation."

But there are exceptions. Only those objects of value which fall under the denomination of merces are liable, and which pay freight. Hence provisions are exempt (t), as is the wearing apparel of passengers. The owners contribute according to the clear value of ship and freight (u) at the end of the voyage, after deducting the expense thereof. Cargo stowed on deck, though not entitled to contribution if jettisoned, contributes even where by the bill of lading goods are so carried "at merchant's risk" (x).

General average.

Mariners do not contribute for their wages, save in the instance of the ransom of the ship (z).

A consignee not owner of the goods at the time the average sacrifice was made is not bound to contribute (a), unless he took delivery under a bill of lading which expressed, or under circumstances which implied, a contract to pay. An owner of goods entitled to average contribution may sue other cargo owners for contribution (b).

As to the time and place of adjusting:—Where the voyage has been completed, or the adventure has been frustrated, all interests or goods which were at risk when the sacrifice or expenditure was made, contribute, and receive contributions, according to their value at the place; goods, for example, are valued, both for the purpose of contributing and receiving contribution, at the market prices at the place of adjustment. The value of the ship is taken at the place of adjustment before any repairs are effected (c). Where new work has been done, or materials supplied to the ship, the general rule is to deduct one-third of the actual cost of repairs, renewals, and materials. No deductions are made when perfectly new materials, such as ropes or sails, have been lost or sacrificed; nor for the value of anchors, provisions, &c., which do not deteriorate. Only one-sixth is deducted for the cost of new chain cables (d).

Goods sold at an intermediate port in the course of the voyage contribute in respect of the benefit which they have derived from the sacrifice (e).

As to goods jettisoned:—

"If the goods jettisoned," said Bovill, C. J., in Fletcher v. Alexander (f), "were in such a condition that they would in all probability have arrived undamaged at the place of adjustment, I see no reason why their value at the time of the jettison should not be taken . . . . On the other hand, it may be that if they had not been thrown overboard they would not in all probability have arrived at their destination in a sound or saleable condition . . . . The value for the purpose of contribution to general average must be taken to be what it would realize in such damaged state."

The practice is, to make an account of the articles that are to contribute, in which the property sacrificed is included, otherwise its owners would receive its value without paying towards the loss. Another account is made of the losses to be replaced: the average is then commonly adjusted by the brokers, and paid by the insurers (g) of the different parties chargeable; and, if there be any dispute, it may be recovered by action (h).

There is a lien for general average when due by the cargo (i), but the owners of the cargo have no lien for it on the ship (j).

This law of general average is of extreme antiquity, being confessedly derived from that passage in the Rhodian Code preserved by Justinian:—"Lege Rhodiâ cavetur, ut, si levandæ navis gratiâ jactus mercium factus sit, omnium contributione sarciatur quod pro omnibus datum est." It is scarcely necessary to point out the reasonableness of this regulation.

"When the ship," writes Lord Tenterden, "is in danger of perishing from the violent agitation of the wind, or from the quantity of water that may have forced a way into it, or is labouring on a rock or a shallow, upon which it may have been driven by a tempest, or when a pirate or an enemy pursues, gains ground, and is ready to overtake it, no measure that may facilitate the motion and passage of the ship can be really injurious to any one who is interested in the welfare of any part of the adventure, and every such measure may be beneficial to almost all. In such emergencies, therefore, when the mind of the brave is appalled, it is lawful to have recourse to every mode of preservation, and to cast out the goods in order to lighten the ship, for the sake of all. But if the ship and the residue of the cargo be saved from the peril by the voluntary destruction or abandonment of part of the goods, equity requires that the safety of some should not be purchased at the expense of others, and therefore all must contribute to the loss" (i).

The jurists of the middle ages sought to fritter away this useful law, by prescribing various, and sometimes intricate, forms to be observed on the occasion of the jettison. But, as Lord Tenterden has remarked,

"The regulations prescribed by persons at ease in the closet or senate-house will seldom be followed at the moment when life or liberty is in jeopardy—at such a moment every one present will exclaim, with the friend of Juvenal:—

'Fundite quæ mea sunt—etiam pulcherrima.'

And, provided that the jettison have been the effect of danger and the cause of safety, all writers agree that contribution ought to be made, although the forms have not been complied with" (k).

Indeed Emerigon, to whom his Lordship refers, cites a remark of Parga, who says, that during sixty years' experience as a Genoese magistrate, he had met with but five instances of regular jettison, all of which were suspected of fraud, because the forms had been too accurately observed.

The following tables show what matters may, according to the recent cases, be the subject of general average contribution:—

Section VI.—Salvage.

Salvage.

Salvage is defined to be a compensation to be made by the shipowner or merchant, to other persons, by whose assistance the ship or its lading may be saved from impending peril, or recovered after actual loss (i). The policy, as well as justice, of awarding such a compensation is so obvious, that it has been in all ages allowed by the codes of all civilized nations. Salvage may become due upon rescue (k), either from the perils of the sea, or from the hands of enemies (l). The property in respect of which salvage is claimed must be salved or saved (m). Even when there is a request and an agreement, the presumption is to hold that nothing is due unless something more than life is saved (n). Though there need not be actual or imminent danger to found a claim for salvage, there must be the possibility of destruction if the services are not performed (o). Towage, as a rule, gives no such claim; and the seamen or crew of a vessel, whose duty is to do the best they can, are not, in ordinary circumstances, entitled to it. But a tug engaged to tow, or a pilot, or even seamen, may be entitled to salvage if unforeseen perils arise and unusual services are performed. The test, as stated in one case in which pilots claimed salvage, is, "Were the acts of the pilots, by reason of the weather and the position of the ship, made so different in danger or responsibility from the ordinary acts of service of pilots, as that no fair and reasonable owner would have insisted on requiring such service for other than salvage reward?" (p). If a contract for specified and agreed salvage services—e. g., to take the vessel to a particular port—cannot be performed by reason of supervening circumstances, such as the coming on of a hurricane, the salvors may recover for salvage services actually rendered (pp). There is no distinction between river and sea salvage (q). Originally salvage was not due for saving life without property. This, however, has been altered by statute (r).

When the rescue is from dangers of the sea, the salvor or rescuer has a lien on the goods preserved (s), and formerly might have kept them till a recompense had been made to him (t); but now, when the salvage of wreck occurs in the United Kingdom (u), they are to be delivered to, and taken charge of by, the receiver appointed by the Board of Trade, who may detain (x) them until satisfaction is made of the salvage, or security has been given by the owner for its payment. The amount of this recompense might, too, if the parties did not agree, have been ascertained by a jury in an action brought by the salvor against the owner of the goods, or by the owner of the goods (having first tendered what he thought sufficient) against the salvor (y). In most cases, the Admiralty Division will, on suit brought, fix the amount of salvage to be paid, and take care of the property pendente lite (z). If the parties have made an agreement as to salvage, the Court will enforce it, unless manifestly unfair; but if the agreement be such, the Court will decree what remuneration, having regard to the value of the property sold and the nature of the services, is reasonable (a). The powers of the Court may, under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act (b), be conferred on a county court in all cases where the value of the property saved does not exceed 1,000*l.*, or the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*, or the parties agree in writing that the Court shall have jurisdiction.

Besides these jurisdictions, a tribunal for the summary adjustment of salvage in certain cases has from time to time been provided by several statutes (c). By the Acts now in force, upon any dispute arising as to the amount of salvage within the United Kingdom which the parties cannot agree to settle, if the sum claimed does not exceed 200*l.*, or upon such a dispute, whether the services were rendered in the United Kingdom or not, where the value of the property saved does not exceed 1,000*l.* (d), it shall be referred to two justices, in the case of wreck, resident near where it is found, or, in the case of services to any ship or boat, or her cargo, &c., resident near the place where she is lying, or into which she is first brought after the accident, or to any stipendiary magistrate or county court judge. If the sum claimed exceed 200*l.*, the dispute may be referred to two justices, if the parties consent; if not, it is to be decided by the High Court, upon the application of either the salvors or owners. But if the claimants do not recover more than 200*l.* they will not recover costs, unless the Court certifies that it was a fit case for the Superior Court. If it be referred to two justices, they may (e) call in a person conversant with maritime affairs as assessor, or, whether they differ or not, appoint such a person sole umpire to decide the matter, and they, or he, will have perfect discretion as to the costs (f). Against any award thus made there is an appeal to the High Court, where the sum in dispute exceeds 50*l.* (g). These regulations do not apply to the Cinque Ports (h), where a summary jurisdiction is, however, provided by stat. 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 76 (i).

When ship, cargo, and freight are benefited by salvage services, all are bound to contribute (j). Passengers' wearing apparel and their personal effects are not liable to contribution (k).

With respect to salvage from enemies, the law formerly was, that where a ship was taken and re-taken before the captor had conducted her infra præsidia, or, at all events, before he had obtained a sentence of condemnation against her, the original owner had a right to her again on paying salvage to the re-captors. But, if not re-taken till a later period, she was deemed to have become the absolute property of the captors, and consequently the lawful prize of the re-captors; the original owner's possibility of reinstatement, or his right of postliminium, being considered extinguished by the carriage infra præsidia, or sentence of condemnation (l). This rule was, however, altered by the Legislature in favour of the original owner of the captured property, who is now entitled to have it again on payment of salvage of one-eighth, no matter at what period the re-capture may have taken place (m); and the benefit of this alteration is extended to the allies of Great Britain, whose vessels have been captured by the enemy and re-captured by British ships, unless, indeed, it appear that those allies themselves act towards British property on a less liberal principle; for, in that case, our Courts adopt their rule, and mete to them according to their own measure of justice (n).

Salvage.

The amount of salvage on re-capture has at various times been variously regulated by statute. In 1793, it was fixed at one-eighth for the Royal Navy, and one-sixth for private ships (o). By the Naval Prize Act, 1854 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 25), s. 40, the rate of salvage is fixed at one-eighth of the value. But the Prize Court may, when the re-capture has been effected under circumstances of special difficulty or danger, award a larger proportion, not exceeding one-fourth.

SECTION I.—Definition and Nature of the Contract.

Definition and nature of the contract.

INSURANCE is a contract by which one person, in consideration of a premium, undertakes to indemnify another against a particular loss (a). The object of the contract in marine and fire insurances is that, in case of loss, the person insured shall be fully indemnified, but no more.

Contracts of life insurance, however, are, as we shall see hereafter, not contracts of indemnity (b); they are contracts to pay a specified sum in a certain event. Even contracts of marine insurance are not always contracts of perfect indemnity; the assured may recover more or less than the sum which would actually compensate him (c). Thus, under a valued policy, that is, where the value of the thing insured has been agreed on between the parties, if there has been a total loss of the thing insured, the assured, who has an insurable interest, recovers, in the absence of fraud, the sum agreed upon, which may be in excess of the true value of the thing lost (c). On the other hand, the value of the thing lost may be in excess of the agreed value, yet the assured does not recover more than the sum in respect of which he paid a premium. It is an implied term in a contract of marine insurance that, in case the assured repair the damage to a ship of a certain age and character, the loss shall be estimated at two-thirds of the cost of the repairs, neither more nor less. It is evident that this can seldom be the accurate measure of the loss. Subject to these qualifications the foundation of insurance law is that, in marine and fire insurances, the assured, in case of a loss against which the insurance is made, shall be fully indemnified, but shall never be more than fully indemnified (d).

The instrument in which the contract of insurance is set forth is called the policy. The party who undertakes to indemnify is called the insurer, and, having subscribed the policy, the underwriter. The party indemnified is termed the insured or assured. The subject-matter of insurance is very extensive, since any description of interest may be insured against any species of danger; save only where the contract would be opposed to the common law, or to some statute (e). The three principal species of insurance, which will alone be taken notice of in this Treatise, are—1. Maritime insurance; 2. Insurance on Lives; 3. Insurance against Loss by Fire.

Maritime Insurance takes place when a merchant gives a premium to others to assure his ship or goods, from one port or place to some other port or place, on such terms as they agree to. Usually, there are several underwriters to each policy of marine insurance, each making himself responsible for a part only of the amount for which the insurance is effected. If the ship or goods, &c., perish, or are lost in whole or in part, every subscriber is to make a recompense either to the extent of his subscription, or pro ratâ in proportion thereto, "whereby," says

(e) Wilson v. Rankin, L. R. 1 Q. B. 162. The statute upon which this case was decided, viz., 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, ss. 170, 171, 172, which forbade the loading of timber on deck, has since been repealed.

Definition and nature of the contract.

the statute 43 Eliz. c. 12 (f), "on the loss or perishing of any ship, there followeth not the undoing of any man, but the loss lighteth rather easily on many than heavily upon a few." Thus, if an insurance effected for 1,000*l.* be subscribed by five underwriters for 200*l.* each, in the event of a loss to the full amount of 1,000*l.* each underwriter pays 200*l.* only; if the loss be only-partial, for instance, to the extent of 250*l.* only, each underwriter pays 50*l.* only.

This contract, which was introduced into England by the Italians (g), appeared of so much importance to the legislature in the reign of Elizabeth, that, by the statute 43 of that Queen, c. 12 (f), the Chancellor was empowered to issue a commission, appointing the Recorder of London, the Judge of the Admiralty, two doctors of the civil law, two common lawyers, and three merchants, to form a court, of whom three were to be a quorum, who were to adjudicate on all controversies arising out of policies. But this jurisdiction, proving defective in many respects, soon fell into disuse, especially after it had been decided by the Court of Upper Bench, in Came v. Moye (h), that a judgment in the Court of Policies in the defendant's favour was no bar to a subsequent action against him for the same cause.

Insurance is always considered a contract uberrimæ fidei, and receives a liberal construction (i), for the benefit of trade and of the assured.

Section II.—The Parties to a Contract of Insurance.

The parties to a contract of insurance.

At common law, any individual, partnership, or corporation, might have become insurers. By stat. 6 Geo. 1, c. 18, the King was empowered to erect two chartered companies, viz., the Royal Exchange Assurance and London Assurance Companies, for insuring ships, and lending money on bottomry; and by the 12th section of that Act, a monopoly was conferred upon them, as against all, excepting individual underwriters (k); of which, however, they have since been deprived, and the common law on this subject is restored, by stat. 5 Geo. 4, c. 114 (l).

The parties to a contract of insurance.

Policies are often issued by mutual insurances or clubs. If composed of more than twenty members, they must be registered under the Companies Acts, and policies issued by them must conform to the requirements of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 7 (m).

Any person, whether British or alien, may, generally speaking, be insured. No policy, however, can be effected, nor action maintained, by or on behalf of an alien enemy during war (n); unless, indeed, his ship be protected by the royal licence, in which case any person who effected the insurance as his trustee may sue (o). A neutral part-owner of goods, the residue of which belongs to one who, before the action, though subsequently to the loss, became an enemy, may sue on an insurance of his own share (p).

Whether a person is an alien enemy depends upon his domicile (q). An English subject living and trading under the protection and for the benefit of a foreign state, is looked on, if that state be hostile, as an enemy; if it be neutral, as a neutral (r). But it does not follow, that because a British or neutral merchant happens to be resident in an enemy's country, goods to be delivered for him at a neutral or friendly port are, on that account, uninsurable (s). Nor does the military occupation of a country by our enemies, ipso facto, constitute the natives of that country also enemies (t). There must be some public act indicative of the intention to conquer or acquire the territory.

Under the head of Parties, it seems proper to remark, that subscriptions to a policy are almost always procured by a Broker (u), concerning whom the practice is, that the underwriters, to whom, in most instances, the insured are unknown, look to the broker for the payment of the premium, and he to the insured. The latter pay the premiums to the broker only, and he is a middle-man between the insured and underwriter. But he is not solely an agent; he is a principal to receive the money from the insured, and pay it to the underwriter (x). The mode in which this payment, and the payment made to the insured in case of loss, is usually effected, is described in Stewart v. Aberdein (y), Sweeting v. Pearce (z), Beckwith v. Bullen (a), and Xenos v. Wickham (b).

"The broker now keeps two accounts with underwriters, called the 'credit account' and the 'cash account.' Till within a few years, only one account was kept, which was that now called the credit account. When the slip for any particular policy is signed, it is arranged between the broker and underwriter whether the premium is to go into the 'credit account,' or the 'cash account.' In either case the broker becomes debtor to the underwriter for the premium at once; but the time and manner of the payment are different in the two cases. If the premium goes into the 'credit account,' it is not payable till the end of the year. If, before the end of the year, any claim arising on one of the policies in the credit account is adjusted by the broker and underwriter, the broker on the adjustment has credit in the account against the under(u) In the absence of any precise instructions, it is the duty of the broker to procure the policy to be made and to obtain it from the insurers within a reasonable time; and he will be liable in an action for an omission to do this. If he seeks to excuse himself on the ground of the impossibility of finding persons willing to undertake the risk, or any other justifiable ground, he must set that up. writer for the amount of the loss thus adjusted, if the account is good for that amount; and at the end of the year, and not till then, the balance on the account, and the balance only, is due in cash from the broker to the underwriter, under a discount of 12 per cent. If the premium, instead of going into the credit account, goes into the cash account, the custom is the same, except that the account is settled and the balance is due in cash at the end of each month instead of the end of the year, and the balance is paid under a small discount."

The parties to a contract of insurance.

Such is the account of the practice in Beckwith v. Bullen (d).

Section III.—The Subject-matter, or what may be Insured.

At common law, an interest on the part of the insured in the subject-matter of the insurance was not absolutely requisite, and might have been dispensed with by a policy containing the words interest or no interest; though, in the absence of such words, it was understood to exist, and must have been proved (e). But by stat. 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 1, it is enacted that

The subject-matter, or what may be insured.

"No assurance or assurances shall be made by any person or persons, bodies corporate or politick, on any ship or ships belonging to his Majesty or any of his subjects, or on any goods, merchandises, or effects laden or to be laden on board any such ship or ships, interest or no interest, or without further proof of interest than the policy, or by way of gaming or wagering, or without benefit of salvage to the assurer, and every such assurance shall be null and void to all intents and purposes."

By sect. 2, however, "assurance on private ships of war, fitted out by any of his Majesty's subjects solely to cruise against his Majesty's enemies, may be made by or for the owners thereof, interest or no interest, free of average, and without benefit of salvage to the assurer;" and by sect. 3, any merchandises or effects from any ports or places in Europe or America, in possession of the crowns of Spain or Portugal, may be insured in the same manner as if this Act had not been made. It will be observed that, in consequence of the words printed in italics, foreign ships are not within the statute (f).

A policy not conforming to this statute is called a Wager Policy, and is void (g). In the recent case of Berridge v. Man On Insurance Co. (h), a policy insuring cash advances on a ship, containing the term "full interest admitted," was held to be avoided by the statute. Its operation is not limited to policies upon "ships, goods, merchandises, and effects." Wherever the subject-matter of a policy is such that, if ships, goods, merchandises, or effects at risk are lost, the subject-matter of the policy will be lost,—the policy is within the statute. Thus, in the case last mentioned (i), a policy insuring cash advances on a ship was deemed to be within the statute, although "cash advances" are not there named, because the cash advances would be lost if the ship were lost. In ordinary cases, therefore, it is now requisite that the subject-matter of insurance should be one in which the insured is interested, and, of course, it must be such as it is possible to have an interest in; and it has been decided, that, if the insured has before the loss assigned away his interest, e. g., by selling the vessel insured, he cannot sue upon the policy for his own benefit, nor as trustee for the assignee, unless the policy was expressly or impliedly assigned (k). The most satisfactory account of what is an insurable interest is that given by Lawrence, J., in Lucena v. Crauford (l):—

"A man is interested in a thing to whom advantage may arise or prejudice happen from the circumstances which may attend it, and whom it importeth that its condition as to safety or other quality should continue; interest does not necessarily imply a right to the whole or any part of a thing, nor necessarily and exclusively that which may be the subject of privation, but the having some relation to, or concern in, the subject of the insurance, which relation or concern, by the happening of the perils insured against, may be so affected as to produce a damage, detriment, or prejudice to the person insuring. And where a man is so circumstanced with respect to matters exposed to certain risks or dangers as to have a moral certainty of advantage or benefit but for those risks or dangers, he may be said to be interested in the safety of the thing. To be interested in the preservation of a thing, is to be so circumstanced with respect to it as to have benefit from its existence, prejudice from its destruction."

The subject-matter, or what may be insured.

"I know no better definition," says Blackburn, J., in Wilson v. Jones (l),

"of an interest in an event than that by Lawrence, J., that if the event happens, the party will gain an advantage; if it is frustrated, he will suffer a loss."

"In order to constitute an insurable interest against any peril," says Phillips, in his work on the Law of Marine Insurance,

"or render a subject insurable against any peril, it must be such an interest or subject that the peril may have a direct effect upon it, instead of a remote, circuitous, consequential effect" (m).

or respondentia interest (t), freight and advances upon it (u), disbursements in the nature of general average at an intermediate port (x), liabilities for damages for running down or damaging another vessel (y),—have all been held fit subjects of Marine Insurance.

A mortgagee who insures to cover his own interest can recover only in respect of it; if the insurance was intended to cover the interest of the mortgagor also, he may recover in respect of both interests (z).

Under the term freight may be insured the benefit an owner would derive from carrying his own goods in his own vessel (a). But, in order to recover under a policy upon freight, the assured must prove that but for the intervention of a peril insured against some freight would have been earned, by showing, either that some goods were put on board, or that there was some contract for doing so (b). In Barber v. Fleming (c), the owner of a ship chartered for a voyage from Howland's Island to the United Kingdom, but lost while on her way from Bombay to Howland's Island, with the object of fulfilling charter, was held entitled to recover on a policy insuring freight.

expense upon the voyage towards earning it, then his interest ceases to be a contingent thing, but becomes an inchoate interest" (d).

The subject-matter, or what may be insured.

A defeasible or inchoate interest may be insured, as well as one absolute and perfect (e). In a word, any person who has an interest in the subject-matter of insurance may be insured to the extent of that interest (f); and any person may be said to have an interest who may be injured by the risks to which that subject-matter is exposed (g). Still, though the definition of an interest is thus wide, there must be some interest such as the law can take notice of. Thus, though the profits likely to be made on an expected cargo may be insured if properly described (h), yet no insurance can be effected on the expected profits of a cargo, to which the claim of the party insuring is founded on a contract void by the Statute of Frauds (i). So, if an assurer of a cargo afloat sells the cargo he cannot recover on the policy, either for himself or the purchaser, in respect of a loss subsequent to the transfer of the cargo, unless there be also a transfer of the policy to the purchaser (j).

The question whether the vendee has an insurable interest in goods, the property in which has not passed to him, but which are at his risk, is more difficult. The point arose in Anderson v. Morice (k), Inglis v. Stock (l) in the House of Lords, and Colonial Insurance Co. of New Zealand v. Adelaide Marine Insurance Co. (m) in the Privy Council. In Anderson v. Morice (n) the contract was for "the cargo of new crop Rangoon rice, per Sunbeam, at 9*s*. 1½*d*. per cwt. cost and freight. Payment by seller's draft on purchaser." Anderson, the buyer, insured the cargo "at and from Rangoon." Before the loading of the cargo was completed the ship sank. The captain afterwards signed and delivered bills of lading, and Anderson accepted the seller's drafts, which were duly honoured. The Exchequer Chamber (Quain, J., dissenting) held, reversing the unanimous judgment of the Commons Pleas, that Anderson had no insurable interest in the cargo and could not recover against the underwriters for the loss. Upon appeal the House of Lords was divided in opinion, and the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber therefore stood (o). In Inglis v. Stock the facts were these: Drake & Co. sold to Stock and to Beloe & Co. each 200 tons of German sugar, "f. o. b. Hamburg; payment by cash in London in exchange for bill of lading"; the price to be according to the percentage of saccharine matter, which was not to exceed or fall short of a certain limit. The goods were to come to Bristol. Afterwards Beloe & Co. resold their 200 tons to Stock at an increased price, but otherwise upon similar terms. To fulfil their two contracts Drake & Co.'s agents shipped in a general ship 390 tons of sugar (being ten tons short) in 3,900 bags, no bags being set apart for one contract more than the other. The bags, however, were each marked, and ten bills of lading made out in an impersonal form, for parcels bearing marks corresponding to those on the bags, were sent to Drake & Co. in London. The goods were lost on the voyage from Hamburg to Bristol. After receiving news of the loss Drake & Co. forwarded invoices of the parcels, by them then allocated by means of the marks on the bills of lading, to Stock and Beloe & Co. respectively. The House of Lords (affirming the Court of Appeal) held that Stock had an insurable interest in the 390 tons.

(o) Lords Chelmsford and Hatherley were of opinion that Anderson had no insurable interest in the cargo. Lords O'Hagan and Selborne were of opinion that he had, either because the property in the rice had vested in him, or, at any rate, that according to the bargain between him and the seller, shown by the fact that he had insured the goods, and not the seller, and by other circumstances, the goods were to be at his risk.

"It is contended," says Lord Selborne, "that, under these circumstances, and for want of a proper division before the loss, the shipment had not the effect of divesting the prior title of Drake & Co., the vendors, or of passing any interest in these sugars to the plaintiff (Stock). This argument appears to me to confound two very different things: the appropriation necessary as between vendor and purchaser, and the division, as between purchaser and purchaser, of specific goods, actually appropriated to the aggregate of the two contracts. . . . In the present case I see no reason to doubt that the difficulty arising from the confusion of parcels, if not solved by consent (or by arbitration, for which each contract provided), would have been soluble by principles of law, applied to the facts and terms of the contracts. The goods were, by the act of the vendors, separated from the bulk of all other goods belonging to them; they were shipped 'free on board' in what (for that purpose) was the purchaser's ship under two contracts so to deliver them, in both which contracts the plaintiff (Stock) was then solely interested" (p).

The interest which an underwriter acquires in the safety of that which he had insured was declared not to be a legal subject-matter of insurance, except in certain cases; but the prohibition of re-assurance has now been repealed (q), and the policy need not state, nor need the assurer disclose, the fact that it is a re-insurance (r). The re-insurance may be limited to some only of the risks included in the original insurance. Thus, an insurer against marine risks generally may re-insure against loss by fire only (s).

(p) 10 App. Cas. at pp. 267, 268. See also per Lord Blackburn, at p. 274. The plaintiff in Anderson v. Morice, though held to have no insurable interest in goods, had an insurable interest in expected profits, against the loss of which he might, by a proper description, have insured himself: Anderson v. Morice, 1 App. Cas. at p. 723, per Lord Chelmsford.

The subject-matter, or what may be insured.

At common law the wages of seamen are not insurable (t). But now that wages no longer depend on the earning of freight (u), the reason for this disability appears to be gone.

The assured must, at the time of the loss, though not necessarily at the time of effecting the policy (x), have an insurable interest. If he has parted with his interest before the loss he cannot recover upon the policy, at any rate for his own benefit (y). If, however, the assured assigns his interest, and at the same time transfers his interest in the policy to the assignee, or agrees that it shall be kept alive for the benefit of the latter, the assured may sue as trustee for the assignee (z).

The policy must properly describe the interest of the assured.

"If no property which answers the description in the policy be at risk, the policy will not attach, though the assured may have other property at risk of equal or greater value; the reason being, that the assurers have not entered into a contract to indemnify the assured for any loss on that other property" (a).

The interest must not be too remote (b). In former editions of this work it was said, "upon the whole, the leaning seems to be at present towards a more confined signification of the word interest than has been attributed to it by some of the older authorities (c). But in Stock v. Inglis (d), Brett, M. R., said:—

"It is the duty of a Court always to lean in favour of an insurable interest. Of course we must not assume facts which do not exist, nor stretch the law beyond its proper limits, but we ought, I think, to consider the question with a mind, if the facts and law will allow it, to find in favour of an insurable interest."

The subject-matter, or what may be insured.

Every policy will be presumed to be an interest, and not a wager policy, unless the contrary appears on the face of it (f).

Apart from the statute 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, it is enacted by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18, in general terms, that "all contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void."

It is scarcely needful to observe that the subject-matter of the insurance will be improper, and the policy unavailable, where a voyage insured is one prohibited by law, or goods insured are intended for carrying on an illegal commerce (g). Trading with an enemy without the king's licence is illegal (h). But such trade will be legalised by a royal licence (i), the conditions of which must be strictly observed. Thus, if it require a bond as a preliminary to exportation, that bond must be given, or the exportation will be illegal (k). So, if the licence be for a limited time; though, if the adventure were bonâ fide prosecuted within the time, it will not become illegal, so as to avoid a policy, because accidentally protracted beyond it (l).

An adventure which involves any breach of the revenue laws of another country will not be deemed illegal. Neither will a voyage for the purpose of conveying contraband of war, or running a blockade. Such, however, are material facts to be disclosed to the underwriters (m).

An insurance on a voyage intended to be in breach of some statute passed to prohibit such voyages would be void. But Wilson v. Rankin (n), and Cunard v. Hyde (o), are authorities to show that if the statute is broken by the master, without the knowledge or authority of the owner, the policy will not be void.

The subject-matter, or what may be insured.

An infirmity in any part of an integral voyage or policy renders the whole illegal (p); as, for instance, if a merchant insure legal and illegal goods together in the same policy. But if a ship bring hither from a hostile country some goods licensed and others not licensed, an insurance on the licensed goods will not be thereby vitiated (q).

A subject of Great Britain, domiciled in a country in amity with ours, may exercise the privilege of a subject of that country, by trading with one in hostility to ours (r).

Section IV.—The Policy—its Form and Construction.

The policy—its form and construction.

The policy, which is usually printed, with a few terms superadded in writing, as the intention of the parties happens to require, is an instrument of an extremely ancient form and very inaccurate and ungrammatical in its language (s). The words in writing, if there be a doubt upon the meaning of the whole, have greater effect attributed to them than those in print, because they are the immediate terms selected by the parties, whereas the others are a general formula (t).

Sect. 7 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, which regulates the stamp duty on marine insurances, provides that—

"No contract or agreement for sea insurance (other than such insurance as is referred to in the 55th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862 (u)), shall be valid unless the same is expressed in a policy; and every policy shall specify the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and the sum or sums insured; and in case any of the above-mentioned particulars shall be omitted in any policy, such policy shall be null and void to all intents and purposes" (v).

The policy must be properly stamped; and no action can be maintained upon the slip, or note—a memorandum of chief particulars in the contract, initialed by the underwriters—which is usually made by the broker before a formal policy is prepared. Though not binding in law, the slip is in practice considered the contract between the parties. It may be given in evidence. Its legal nature is thus stated by Blackburn, J., in Ionides v. The Pacific Ins. Co. (x):—

"The slip is in practice, and according to the understanding of those engaged in marine insurance, the complete and final contract between the parties, fixing the terms of the insurance and the premium, and neither party can, without the assent of the other, deviate from the terms thus agreed on without a breach of faith, for which he would suffer severely in his credit and future business. [The slip] is by virtue of [30 Vict. c. 23, ss. 7, 9,] not valid, that is, not enforceable at law or in equity; but it may be given in evidence wherever it is, though not valid, material."

Parol evidence is not admissible to control the meaning of a policy, or, indeed, of any other written instrument (y): though it is admissible, as in cases of other mercantile instruments, to explain the language of the policy, with reference to the usual practice of trade, ex. gr., to show that the Gulf of Finland is considered by mercantile men part of the Baltic (z). and generally known usages of maritime trades or ports (a); for example, the usage for underwriters to pay the broker or to settle the loss between them in account (b). Being primâ facie only the usage of a single house, the usage of Lloyd's will not be binding on one who cannot be shown to be acquainted with it (c). A policy will be construed by the law of the place where the contract was made (d).

A policy is either open or valued. An open policy is where the value of the thing insured is not inserted in the policy; and, therefore, must be proved at the trial, if a loss happen. A valued policy is where the value of the thing insured is settled by agreement between the parties (e), and inserted in the policy, usually in this form:—"The said ship, &c., goods and merchandise, &c., for so much as concerns the assureds by agreement between the assureds and assurers in this policy, are and shall be valued at £ ." And sometimes the words, "the policy to be deemed sufficient proof of interest in case of loss," are added. But having regard to 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 1, and the decision in Berridge v. Man On Insurance Co. (f), the insertion of these latter words would vitiate the policy. Valued policies derive their origin from the difficulty the assured sometimes had in proving the value of his interest, which induced him to give the insurer a greater premium to agree to estimate it at a certain sum; from which he derives this advantage, viz., that in case of a total loss of what is insured, he is only bound to show some interest in order to satisfy the statute 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, but not the value, because that is admitted by, and in the absence of fraud, is conclusive upon the insurer (g) and the insured (h) for the purposes of the particular contract of insurance (i). However, valued policies must not be used as a cover for wagering; and, therefore, the interest of the assured must be a real bonâ fide interest, not a mere colourable one, otherwise the policy will be void; nay, if he fraudulently over-value his interest, in order to cheat the insurers, he will not be permitted to recover even for what he actually had on board (k). Exorbitant over-valuation may be evidence of fraud or wagering (l). If the whole of the property insured have not been at risk, the assured will recover only on the part actually at risk. In other respects the valuation, for the purposes of the contract, is conclusive (m).

"Be it known that A. B. Upon any kind of goods and merchandises, and also upon the body, tackle, apparel, ordnance, munition, artillery, boat and other furniture, of and in the good ship or vessel called the ——, whereof is master, under God, for this present voyage, C. D., or whosoever else shall go for master in the said ship, or by whatsoever other name or names the same ship, or the master thereof, is or shall be named or called; beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from the loading thereof aboard the said ship, —— upon the said ship, &c. ——, and shall so continue and endure during her abode there, upon the said ship, &c. And further, until the said ship, with all her ordnance, tackle, apparel, &c., and goods and merchandises whatsoever, shall be arrived at —— upon the said ship, &c., until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety; and upon the goods and merchandises, until the same be there discharged and safely landed. and touch and stay at any ports or places whatsoever —— without prejudice to this insurance. The said ship, &c., goods and merchandises, &c., for so much as concerns the assured, by agreement between the assured and assurers in this policy, are and shall be valued at ——. Touching the adventures and perils which we the assurers are contented to bear and do take upon us in this voyage: they are of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and counter-marts, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes and people, of what nation, condition or quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandises and ship, &c., or any part thereof. And in case of any loss or misfortune, it shall be lawful to the assured, their factors, servants and assigns, to sue, labour and travel for, in and about the defence, safeguard and recovery of the said goods and merchandises, and ship, &c., or any part thereof, without prejudice to this insurance; to the charges whereof we the assurers will contribute, each one according to the rate and quantity of his sum herein assured. And it is agreed by us, the insurers, that this writing or policy of assurance shall be of as much force and effect as the surest writing or policy of assurance heretofore made in Lombard Street, or in the Royal Exchange, or elsewhere, in London. And so we the assurers are contented, and do hereby promise and bind ourselves, each one for his own part, our heirs, executors, and goods, to the assured, their executors, administrators and assigns, for the true performance of the premises, confessing ourselves paid the consideration due unto us for this assurance by the assured —— at and after the rate of ——.

Let us consider these in order:— The policy—its form and construction.

1st, Name of Insured.—By statute 28 Geo. 3, c. 56, it is enacted, that it shall not be lawful for any person to make or effect any policy of insurance on any ship, goods, or other property, without first inserting the name or names, or usual style and firm, of one or more of the persons interested in such insurance, or of the consignor or consignors, consignee or consignees of the property so insured, or of the person or persons residing in Great Britain who shall receive the order for and effect such policy, or of the person or persons who shall give the order to the agent immediately employed to effect such policy. Policies are declared void if contrary to this statute (o). But the statute having been passed to remedy the hardships caused by the earlier Act 25 Geo. 3, c. 44, has received a liberal construction. Thus, the words "consignees (o), persons who shall receive the order, &c.," have been construed to include general agents (o).

The Policies of Marine Insurance Act, 1868, provides that the assignee of a policy which has been assigned "so as to pass the beneficial interest in such policy to any person entitled to the property thereby insured," may sue on the policy in his own name (p). The assignee, whether he sues in his own name or in that of the assignor, is subject to any rights which might be set up against the latter. The underwriter will not, either under this Act or sect. 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873, be able to set off against the assignee a debt for policies effected after the assignment; such a claim is not a "defence" within the meaning of the former statute (q). The assignment may be by indorsement according to the form given in the schedule to the Act.

The assignment may be made after loss (r).

2ndly, The name of Ship.—The ship ought to be truly described; for a variance from its right name might discharge the underwriter. Where the name of the ship is known it is indorsed on the policy. It is, however, usual to insert in the policy, "or by whatever other name or names the same ship shall be called;" the effect of which is to render a mistake in the name immaterial, if the identity of the ship can be proved and the underwriter be not prejudiced by it (s). A policy may also be effected upon ship or ships expected from any particular place, or "per ship or ships" (t). Declaring the name of the ship is not a condition precedent to recovering, and an innocent mistake as to the name in the declaration will not vitiate the contract (u). The same observations apply to the name of the master (v), which is generally inserted along with that of the ship, with the addition of "or whosoever else shall go for master in the said ship." The person substituted must be competent; or if made for a fraudulent purpose the change would vitiate the contract (x).

3rdly, The subject-matter of Insurance.—The subject-matter should be described with accuracy (y), and evidence of usage is not admissible to contradict the plain meaning of such description (z). A ship-owner may insure, under the name of freight, the benefit he expects to derive from carrying his own goods in his own vessel (a), or, under the term "average expenses" per the ship, a lien on the cargo for salvage for which he has given security (b). So provisions are comprehended under the word furniture (c). It is a sufficient description to say that a policy is upon goods generally. But that word will be intended to mean goods of ordinary, not extraordinary, danger, not such, for instance, as goods intended to be lashed on deck (d), unless, indeed, they be goods which it is usual and proper to stow there (e): for what is usually done by such a ship with such a cargo on such a voyage is understood to be referred to by every policy, and to make a part of it, as much as if it were expressed therein (f). An assurance may be effected upon profits generally (g). But freight or profits must be insured eo nomine, and are not covered by a policy on goods (h). Nor will a policy on goods cover the interest of a purchaser to whom the property does not pass until delivery (i).

Although the subject-matter of insurance must be properly described, the nature of the interest may be, generally speaking, left at large: in other words, though a policy must state correctly what is insured, it is not necessary that the reason why the party insures should also be expressed (j). It sometimes happens that the insurance is upon goods, "to be thereafter declared and valued, by ship or ships;" or upon ships to be named, or in some form which leaves it to the insured to make a subsequent declaration of the goods or ships intended. This declaration of interest, as it is called, is the mere exercise of a power conferred on the assured; it requires no assent on the part of the underwriters, though they generally sign their initials to it, not, however, for the purpose of expressing their assent, but for that of authentication (k). The insured, therefore, can only fill it up so as to be consistent with the policy, and has not, in the ordinary form of policy, power to declare the matters of the risk in separate parcels, so as to make the average clause apply separately to each (l). It is generally put upon the policy for convenience. But this is not necessary; neither is there any necessity for its being in writing. An error in it, made without fraud, may be corrected without the assent of the underwriter, and without a new stamp (m). But though it does not require the underwriter's assent, it ought to be communicated to him (n), else it would be in the power of the insured to destroy it, and substitute another in its place.

If the words of the policy be large enough to cover an illegal adventure, and an illegal adventure was in fact intended by the insured, the policy is void, and the underwriter cannot sue for the premium (o). To adapt to the actual facts of commerce the policy, in the above form, which strictly applies only where the same person is interested in cargo and ship, it is customary to insert in writing on the margin or body of the policy a description of the true nature of the subject-matter of insurance.

be accurately described; the description comprehending the times and places at which the risk is to begin and end (q). The statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, by s. 7, enacts that "every policy shall specify the particular risk or adventure, and in case [the same] be omitted in any policy, such policy shall be null and void to all intents and purposes."

It is said that an omission of the place where the risk is to begin would render the policy void for uncertainty (r), but that an omission of the time would cause the risk to begin from the making of the policy (s). The insertion of the words at and from the ship's loading port has the effect of making the insurer answerable for any misfortune which may happen after her arrival (t), or while the ship remains there, as if she be burnt or lost there, or detained by an embargo (u). The insertion of these words, moreover, implies that the ship is either there at the time, or shortly will be there (x); in default of which the underwriter is discharged; and, if she be not there when the policy is made, she must, in order that the risk may attach, arrive there in good physical safety. If she arrive at the outward port so shattered as to be a mere wreck, a policy on the homeward voyage never attaches (y). I use the words physical safety, because it is sufficient if she arrive safe in that sense, though from political causes she may be in great danger of condemnation (z). It is also implied that she shall sail thence as soon as she reasonably can; and, therefore, if the insured mean to protect his vessel during a stay in port, he should use those words in the policy (a). the ship being in a foreign port, means on the homeward freight, and will not cover a subsequent loss of the outward (b); neither does such a policy at all attach until the vessel is in a condition to begin to take in her homeward cargo (c). When the policy is at and from any island or district, the words in general protect the ship in sailing from one port to another in that island or district for the purpose of loading, at least if the whole island or district be usually considered as one place (d); but it would be otherwise if the policy were "at and from her port of lading in such an island or district," the commencement of the voyage would then be restricted to one particular place; and, generally speaking, the words port of lading comprehend one place only; and it is a deviation if a ship insured at and from her port of lading, begin to load at one place and finish at another out of the line of her intended voyage, even though within the jurisdiction of the same custom-house (e). A policy on goods at and from G., beginning the adventure from the loading on board the ship, does not protect goods laden before the ship's arrival at G. (f), unless it be collected from the words of the instrument that a prior loading was contemplated (g); as when the words used were "from the loading on board the ship wheresoever" (h), or "outward cargo to be considered homeward interest twenty-four hours after her arrival at her first port of discharge" (i). A policy likewise on profits on goods, at and from M., laden or to be laden, "beginning the adventure upon the said goods from and immediately after the loading thereof aboard the said ship," will not cover a loss of profits on any goods not actually put on board (k). Nor will a policy on goods "at and from Hull to London," including all risk of craft, until the goods are discharged and safely landed, cover goods which are discharged into lighters, not with the intention of landing them, but of transhipping to other ships for exportation (l). A voyage to A., B., and C. means a voyage to all or any of them, with this reserve, if the ship go to more places than one, she must visit them in the order in which they are mentioned in the policy (m), and must not split the voyage into two, e. g., by loading goods at A., and unloading them and loading others at B. (n). But she may omit visiting any of the ports named (o). If the voyage be described as "from A. to B., with liberty to call at any ports in any order," the vessel is authorized only to call at ports which would naturally and usually be ports of call on the voyage from A. to B. (p). If a voyage be from or to a district containing several ports, they must, in the absence of provisions to the contrary, be visited in their geographical order (q). But (q) Clason v. Simmonds, 6 T. R. 533, n. See Andrews v. Mellish, 5 Taunt. 496. It will be stated presently, p. 453, that in case of a voyage to, or liberty to touch at, several places, they must be taken in the order mentioned in the policy; but as this results from an implication from the order in which they are named, it probably might be controlled by a custom to visit them in a different order.

These cases have been the subject of much dispute, Carr v. Montefiore, 5 B. & S. 408. Phillips, 1, s. 939, suggests as an approximate statement of their effect the following: "This specification of the terminus a quo, unless it appears by the policy to be intended as a warranty of the loading at the designated place, is to be taken as mere recital, description, or intention or expectation, being at most an implied representation of the loading, and is to be construed accordingly." Parsons (2 Insurance, 50) says that if the language of the whole policy and all the circumstances of the case "make it appsrent that it was not the intention of the parties to make the attachment of the policy dependent upon the fact of loading, it would seem to us a departure, not only from natural justice, but from the true and rational principles of commercial law," to treat these words as a warranty. This seems to be the true view.

The policy—its form and construction.

If the vessel sail upon a voyage different from that described in the policy, or, having sailed on that described, afterwards deviate, the underwriters are released (r); their risk, in the former case, never attaching, and in the latter, being discharged upon a principle which we will explain when we come to speak of warranties. A mere intention to deviate, never carried into effect, will not discharge the underwriters (s); and, if the ship be hindered from completing her voyage by a mere temporary impediment, she may, it would seem, lawfully wait at a neighbouring place of safety till it is removed, and afterwards pursue her voyage at the risk of the underwriter (t).

In Wingate v. Foster (u), the policy effected on four steam pumps belonging to a salvage steamer about to proceed to a wreck, stated the risk to be at and from "Ardrossan to the Alexandra, steamer, ashore in the neighbourhood of Drogheda, and whilst there engaged at the wreck, and until again returned to Ardrossan." The stranded steamer was raised by means of the pumps. While she was being towed to Ardrossan, with the pumps on board, she met with bad weather. Her course was altered, and an endeavour was made to seek refuge in Belfast. The Alexandra foundered before she reached the port. There being no such words as "with liberty to go to a port of refuge," it was held that the loss was not covered by the policy.

We have seen that the words at and from an island or district will protect the ship in sailing from one port of that island or district to another. But where she is insured to such an island or district, the risk as to the ship determines immediately after she has been moored for twenty-four hours at the first port there at which she stops to unload (u); the owner who wishes to avoid the effect of this rule should insure the vessel to her port or ports of discharge. These words, if used, protect the vessel till her cargo is substantially discharged—I say substantially, for if the principal part of the cargo be unladen, the risk will thereupon determine, though part be left on board to effect some object unconnected with that of the voyage insured, e. g., to serve as ballast while she proceeds in search of a new cargo (x). As to the goods, they will in general continue to be protected till their arrival at their port of delivery (y).

The voyage, as far as the underwriter's risk is concerned, is generally limited to determine when the ship has been moored (z) "twenty-four hours (a) in good safety." The words "good safety" are material. For instance, though she arrive in port, and remain there more than four-and-twenty hours, yet if she arrive a mere wreck, and afterwards founder, she cannot be said to have been moored an instant in good safety, and the underwriters will not be discharged (b). But it is otherwise, if, having continued in safety twenty-four hours, she be afterwards lost, although in consequence of an act performed during the voyage; for instance, smuggling (c); and if the words good safety be not used, the risk determines at the expiration of the limited time, whatever may be the condition of the vessel (d).

The policy—its form and construction.

But if the risk be "until the ship be discharged from her voyage," she is not considered discharged until the goods are unladen (e).

The risk on goods is generally limited to continue until they shall be "discharged and safely landed" (f). This landing must, however, be accomplished with reasonable expedition; delay would be in the nature of a deviation, and would discharge the underwriter (g). But as the policy protects the goods till landed, the underwriter is liable, though the loss happen after a transhipment into shallops, lighters, droghers, or launches for the purpose of landing the goods, such transhipment being in the usual course of the voyage (h), which course the underwriter is, as we have repeatedly observed, presumed to know. But it is otherwise, if the loss occur while the goods are in lighters at the port of delivery for transhipment into an export vessel (i), if the assured tranship them on board another vessel (k), or send his own lighter and take the goods into his own custody, or discharge the public lighterman who was employed (l).

By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 8 (m), time policies for any period exceeding a year are void.

If the words "lost or not lost" be inserted in a time policy, the policy may cover past losses (n). Under a time policy underwriters will be liable for any losses within the period named, though the nature of the damage be not known until after its expiration (o).

5thly, Perils.—The perils against which the insurer guarantees are described to be "of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and counter-mart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people, of what nation, condition, or quality soever; barratry of the master and mariners, and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes, that have or shall come to the hurt, or detriment, or damage of the said ———, or any part thereof." The underwriters may be liable for losses prior to the date of the policy, provided there be no concealment or misrepresentation. Where the words "lost or not lost," Gallicè sur bonnes et mauvaises nouvelles, are inserted, as they usually are, they render the underwriter liable in respect of any of the above perils, though the ship be lost before the insurance (p); they render the policy, in the words of Parke, B., "a contract of indemnity against all past as well as all future losses sustained by the assured in respect of the interest insured" (q). Even in the absence of the words "lost or not lost" the policy will cover past losses, if the intention to include these appears from the description of the rest (r). A policy containing the words "lost or not lost" will even include cases in which the subject-matter of insurance had not vested in the assured at the time of the occurrence of the loss; for instance, if a merchant having bought goods at sea were to insure them, lost or not lost, the policy would cover a loss sustained by them during the voyage, but before the purchase (s). It is sometimes the practice to restrain these words, by warranting the ship to be well on a particular day; yet, even then, if she were well on any part of that day, though she be lost before the policy is effected, the underwriter will be liable (t). Indeed, if the insured, or an agent by whom the insurance is effected, or an agent who ought to have and might have disclosed the fact to the insured (u), knows at the time of making the insurance that the ship is lost, that fraud avoids the policy (x). But where the member of a mutual insurance company proposed a vessel for insurance which was accepted, and the premium paid, but afterwards and before the policy was actually executed she was lost, which was known to all parties at the time of executing the policy, the words lost or not lost were held to entitle the assured to recover. The Court said, that there was considerable analogy between this case and Payne v. Meller (y), decided by Lord Eldon, who held the purchaser bound to perform his contract, although the house was burnt before the time appointed for conveying it. So in the present case the insured had bought and paid for the underwriter's promise to indemnify; and equity would have compelled the latter to execute a formal policy whenever tendered to him: in voluntarily executing it he had only performed a manifest duty, and could not now retract the obligation (z).

Perils of the Sea.—These words mean losses occasioned strictly by sea damage (a), e. g., by stress of weather, winds, and waves, lightning and tempest, rocks, sands, &c. Their meaning was explained in The Xantho by Lord Herschell in the passage already cited (ante, pp. 328, 329). It follows from that statement that a loss occasioned by collision is a peril of the sea (b); so is a loss by the insured vessel striking the ground under the influence of a swell on the uneven bed of a dry harbour (c), or a loss of animals killed by the agitation of the ship in a storm (d). But a loss by delay on the voyage caused by bad weather is not (e). If a vessel be not heard of within a reasonable time after her sailing, it is presumed that she foundered, and the assured may recover for a loss by perils of the sea (f). A loss occasioned by sea water coming into a vessel through a hole eaten in the vessel by rats is a loss by perils of the sea (g). But a loss from worms or rats eating the ship or goods is not (h). If the ship insured be hove down on the beach within the tideway to repair, and thereby bilged (i), or if damage is caused from the flow of water into a ship lying in dock through the discharge pipes, the valves of which have been left open (j), it would seem that these are not, strictly speaking, losses by perils of the sea, because the vessel is ashore when the damage is done. Though not losses from perils of the sea, they are certainly losses from "perils of a like kind" within the general words in the policy (k). The bursting of the air-chamber of a donkey-pump, which was being used in pumping water into the boilers of a steamer for the purpose of navigation, was held, in Thames and Mersey Mar. Ins. Co. v. Hamilton, Fraser & Co. (l), not to come either within the words "perils of the sea," or the words "perils of a like kind."

A loss caused immediately by perils of the sea is within the policy, though it would not have occurred but for the concurrent action of some other cause which is not within it (m); for contracts of marine insurance are to be construed by the maxim, causa proxima et non remota spectatur (n). But the maxim must not be applied too literally (o). Where sea water coming into a vessel injured hides on board her, and caused them to become putrid, and tobacco, which was a part of the cargo, contracted an ill-flavour from the odour caused by the putrid hides, it was held that the injury to the tobacco was caused by perils of the sea, although the sea water had not touched the tobacco (p).

Fire.—How the fire was occasioned is immaterial, whether by a common accident, or by the negligence of the crew, or lightning, or an act done in duty to the State (q), or to prevent capture (r). But if goods be put on board in a damaged condition, and are, in consequence, liable to effervesce, and generate the fire by which they are consumed, the underwriters are not liable (s).

Enemies.—This word is used in contradistinction to "pirates, rovers, thieves," afterwards mentioned, a capture by whom is an act of depredation; whereas one by enemies is an act done jure belli (t). We have already had occasion to touch upon the change of property by capture, and to state that the mere fact of capture does not of itself divest an owner's property in the thing captured, though capture is deemed a total loss so long as the vessel remains in the possession of the captors (u). Insurance, however, being a contract of indemnity, the insured must be reimbursed, if he have in point of fact suffered a loss, and the underwriter cannot protect himself by any technical rules about the change of property (v). If, indeed, the vessel be recaptured, and the owners become entitled to restitution on payment of salvage, that may, under some circumstances, change into a partial loss one which was primâ facie total (x). But, even when the vessel is preserved, the insured have a right to be indemnified against charges bonâ fide incurred in accomplishing that object; as where a neutral ship was improperly captured, an interlocutory decree pronounced against her, and the owners, dreading the expense and delay of appeal, compromised the suit, and purchased the captor's consent to a reversal (y). An insurance against British capture is illegal, as being against public policy (z).

Pirates, Rovers, and Thieves.—The meaning of the word pirate is explained in 4 Bl. Comm. 72 (a). Generally speaking, he is one who commits on the high seas those acts of robbery and depredation, which, if committed on land, would have been felonies. Thieves are persons external to the ship (b).

whether at peace or war with us (e). The term people signifies the ruling power of a country whatever it may be, and will not include a crowd of riotous individuals (f). One of the most usual species of detainments is an embargo, which is an arrest laid on ships or merchandise by public authority, or a prohibition of State (g), commonly issued to prevent foreign ships from putting to sea in time of war, and sometimes to exclude them from entering our ports.

As we have seen that the insured is not protected against British capture, so neither is a foreigner allowed to insure against British detention (h), except so far as it may be accidental and erroneous (i). Formerly there prevailed an idea that a foreigner could not effectually insure against the act of his own government (j), unless the underwriter agreed to make such insurance with full knowledge of the country of the insured (k); for a foreigner, insured against a loss of that description, might give such information to his own government as would produce a seizure, the blow of which would fall upon the British underwriter. The restraint also might be regarded as that of the insured himself, as every subject of a State was to be regarded as consenting to, and adopting every act of his own government. But this fiction has been disregarded, and a foreigner, in a time of peace, may effectually protect himself by such an insurance (l). It seems, too, that a British subject might insure against British embargo (m). If the detention be occasioned by the gross negligence (n), or improper conduct of the assured himself, e. g. in carrying simulated papers without the underwriter's permission, he will not be permitted to recover; for his supineness or misconduct is a breach of his implied warranty to guard against the risks covered by the policy (o). But a contravention of the mere revenue laws of a foreign country, consented to by the underwriter, will not vitiate it; for our Courts do not take notice of them (p). If the vessel be deterred from proceeding on her voyage through fear of an embargo (q), or find the port of destination shut against her (r), or be permitted to land her goods (which are afterwards seized) in the usual manner (s) these losses are not within the policy; for, in the former cases, there was no seizure; in the last, none until the voyage had determined. But the underwriter cannot protect himself by saying that the seizure was unjustifiable, or that the insured had a remedy over against the aggressors (t).

Barratry by the Master and Mariners.—Barratry is derived from an Italian word, which signifies to cheat. In policies it includes every species of fraud or knavery in the master or mariners of the ship, by which the owners are injured (u). Phillips, s. 1062 (who collects the various judicial definitions of barratry), thus defines it:—

"An unlawful, fraudulent, or dishonest act of the master, mariners, or other carriers, or of gross misconduct, or very gross and culpable negligence, contrary, in either case, to their duty to the owner, and that might be prejudicial to him or to others interested in the voyage or adventure."

The policy—its form and construction.

Thus barratry may be committed by a wilful deviation in fraud of the owner (v), by smuggling (x), by sailing in breach of an embargo, and rendering ship liable to seizure (y), by wilfully breaking a blockade (z), by running away with the ship (a), by sinking or deserting her, or by defeating or delaying the voyage with a criminal intent (b). Even dropping at anchor with a fraudulent intent is barratry (c). If, by reason of these or other similar acts, the subject-matter of insurance is detained, lost, or forfeited, the insured will be entitled to recover for a loss by barratry. However, to constitute an act of barratry, there must be fraud or wilful misconduct—it must arise ex maleficio; a simple deviation through ignorance, unaccompanied with fraud or crime, will not be barratry (d). From the definition of barratry above given, it follows that it can be committed by no one but the master and mariners, and against no one but the owner of the ship (e), a term which, however, comprehends owners pro hâc vice, e. g., general freighters (f). Of course, when the owner of the ship is also master, he cannot commit barratry against himself (g), nor can an act performed with his consent be barratrous against him (h). But a part-owner, who is also master, may be guilty of barratry (i). Barratry may not be committed against the freighter with the consent of the general owner (k), unless, perhaps, in cases where the freighter must be considered to be the owner pro hâc vice (l); nor against the owners with the consent of the freighter (m). But though an act cannot be barratrous against the owner, if it be done with his consent, yet an act done for his benefit, if without his consent, may. Thus, where the master, having general instructions to make the best purchases with despatch, went to an enemy's port and traded there, for which his ship was seized, this was held barratry, although his only object was to do the best for his employer (n); for it is not for him to judge in cases not entrusted to his discretion, or to suppose that he is not breaking the trust reposed in him, but acting meritoriously, when he endeavours to advance the interest of his owners by means which the law forbids, and which his owners must be taken also to have forbidden, both from their sense of public duty and their dread of risk. It is not necessary that the loss should be contemporaneous with the barratry; but the barratry must happen during the voyage insured (o), and must be the immediate cause of the loss (p). Thus, when the master, during the voyage, committed barratry by smuggling, for which the ship was seized, but not till after she had been moored twenty-four hours in safety at her destined port, the underwriter was held to be discharged.

Other Perils.—These general words are inserted, as Molloy remarks, to preclude all those nice questions formerly agitated by civilians and common lawyers, and may be useful where the loss, though one against which the assured ought to be indemnified, does not fall within any of the other classes specified in the policy. The first case in which the effect of these words came directly into question was Cullen v. Butler (q), where the crew of a British ship, believing the ship insured to be an enemy, fired upon and sunk her. It was held that though, perhaps, not a "peril of the seas," this loss came within the general words "all other perils, &c." Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in delivering judgment, said—

> That as these general words "must be considered as introduced into the policy in furtherance of the objects of marine insurance, and may have the effect of extending a reasonable indemnity to many cases not distinctly covered by the special words, they are entitled to be considered as material and operative words, and to have the due effect assigned to them in the construction of the instrument; and which will be done by allowing them to comprehend and cover other cases of marine damage of the like kind with those which are specially enumerated and occasioned by similar causes."

And the House of Lords, in the recent case of Thames and Mersey Mar. Ins. Co. v. Hamilton, Fraser & Co. (r), in which the previous authorities are reviewed, adopts this as the true rule of construction. The question was, whether damage to a donkey engine owing to the closing of a valve by the negligence of the engineer, or accidentally, fell within the general words. The House of Lords held that it did not.

> "The damage to the donkey engine" said Lord Bramwell, "was not through its being in a ship, or at sea. . . . The sea, waves, and winds had nothing to do with it."

The question, said Lord Herschell, referring to Cullen v. Butler (s), is,— > "whether the loss falls within the general words, as construed by Lord Ellenborough; that is, whether it is a case 'of marine damage of the like kind with those which are specially enumerated, and occasioned by similar causes.'"

Where the captain of a ship had thrown a quantity of dollars overboard to prevent their falling into the hands of an enemy, by whom the ship was pursued, this was held to be a loss, if not by jettison, at least ejusdem generis with jettison, and, therefore, within the general words (u). Where a ship, placed in a graving dock to be repaired, was, by the violence of the wind, thrown over on her side and bilged, this loss was held to be within the general words (x). The policy—its form and construction.

The perils and losses mentioned in the policy having been thus separately considered, there remain a few general observations on this part of the contract.

First, the underwriters are not liable for a loss which is necessarily incidental to the property, rather than occasioned by an adventitious cause (y), such as loss by decomposition, as of meat, fruit, flour (z), by worms (a), or rats (b), or the self-ignition of damaged hemp (c), or natural decay or deterioration.

Secondly, there is a class of losses which seems not to fall within the contemplation of the policy, but only to entitle the loser to be reimbursed by the owner of the ship (d); as, for instance, where the captain is obliged to sell part of the goods for the repair of ship (e).

Thirdly, in policies on freight, it has been held, that if the goods laden still exist, and the ship continue capable of carrying them, the underwriter is not liable, although the master sell or leave them behind on account of the great expense which would attend carrying them forward; for though he may in doing so have exercised a prudent discretion, yet it would be dangerous to allow him, by any exercise of his discretion, to cast the loss of freight from the shoulders of his owner on those of the underwriter (f). But it has been since decided, that when the goods are so damaged by a peril of the sea in the course of the voyage as to render them incapable, except at a cost which would exceed their value on arrival, of being carried to their destination, and they are, therefore, left behind at an intermediate port, the assured may recover for loss of freight (g).

Fourthly, a loss is properly ascribed to a particular peril, if that peril be the immediate cause of the loss, though another cause may have contributed; as where a merchant vessel was taken in tow by a ship of war, and thus exposed to a tempestuous sea (h), this loss was properly ascribed to the perils of the sea; so where an enemy chases the ship and takes her, the loss is one by capture, though that enemy would not have overtaken her had not her rate of sailing been checked by sea damage (i). In these and many other instances (k) the maxim equally applies "in jure causa proxima non remota spectatur" (l). Thus, where a vessel in consequence of the barratry of the master in smuggling was seized by Spanish revenue officers, with a view to procure her condemnation and confiscation, the loss to the owner was held to be due to "capture and seizure," and not to the "barratry" of the master (m). A ship was chartered for time on monthly hire, with a proviso that, if at any time the ship became inefficient, the charterers might put her out of pay; the

The expense of carrying the goods forward is a particular charge, which may be recovered under the suing and labouring clause if the expenses are incurred by the insured. Kidston v. *The Empire M. ship having become inefficient by perils of the sea, the charterers refused to pay further freight; the loss of freight by the owner was attributed to the exercise of the option by the charterers, and not to "perils of the sea" (n). It is sometimes said that there is a difference as to this maxim between cases of bills of lading and policies of insurance. How far this is so, is explained in the judgment of Lord Herschell in The Xantho (o):

The policy—its form and construction.

"Now, I quite agree that in the case of a marine policy the causa proxima is alone considered. If that which immediately caused the loss was a peril of the sea, it matters not how it was induced, even if it were by the negligence of those navigating the vessel. It is equally clear that in the case of a bill of lading you may sometimes look behind the immediate cause, and the shipowner is not protected by the exception of perils of the sea in every case in which he will be entitled to recover on his policy, on the ground that there has been a loss by such perils. But I do not think that this difference arises from the words 'perils of the sea' having a different meaning in the two instruments, but from the context or general scope and purpose of the contract of carriage, excluding, in certain cases, the operation of the exception. It would, in my opinion, be very objectionable, unless well-settled authority compelled it, to give a different meaning to the same words occurring in two maritime instruments. The true view appears to me to be presented by Willes, J., in his judgment in Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. (p). The question there arose whether, when a vessel was lost by a collision caused by the negligence of those navigating the carrying ship, the case fell within the exception of 'perils of the sea.' It was held that it did not. Reference having been made to cases on policies of insurance, and the interpretation there put upon these words, Willes, J., said: 'I may say that a policy of insurance is an absolute contract to indemnify for loss by perils of the sea, and it is only necessary to see whether the loss comes within the terms of the contract, and is caused by perils of the sea; the fact that the loss is partly caused by things not distinctly perils of the sea, does not prevent its coming within the contract. In the case of a bill of lading it is different, because there the contract is to carry with reasonable care, unless prevented by the excepted perils. If the goods are not carried with reasonable care, and are consequently lost by perils of the sea, it becomes necessary to reconcile the two parts of the instrument, and this is done by holding that if the loss through perils of the sea is caused by the previous default of the shipowner, he is liable for this breach of his covenant.'"

Fifthly, when two causes contribute equally to the loss it may be ascribed to either. Thus, if a ship be barratrously delivered to the enemy, the loss may be ascribed either to barratry or capture (q), as, in the case of Hagedorn v. Whitmore above cited, it probably might have been to seizure and detention, as well as to the perils of the sea. Where two causes, however, both contribute to the loss, but unequally, the maxim "in jure causa proxima non remota spectatur" applies. And if the proximate cause of the loss be not reducible to some one of the perils mentioned in the policy, the underwriters will not be chargeable with it. For instance, if the vessel insured be driven against another ship by stress of weather, this is an injury by perils of the sea, and the insurer must make it good. But, if in the collision she do some damage to the other ship, a positive rule of the Court of Admiralty prescribes that the loss sustained by both shall be added together and the aggregate equally divided. Now, in this case, if the ship insured have done more damage than she has received, and her owners are, therefore, obliged to pay the balance, this is neither a necessary nor proximate effect of the perils of the sea; it grows out of a provision of the law of nations, and cannot be charged upon the underwriters (r). In consequence of the decision in De Vaux v. Salvador (r), what is known as the running-down clause, providing for the contingency of collisions, was introduced into policies (s).

Date and Subscription.—The date and subscription, including a receipt for the premium, are inserted as follows: "And so we, the assurers, are contented, and do hereby promise and bind ourselves each one for his own part, our heirs, executors, and goods, to the assured, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for the true performance of the premises, confessing ourselves paid the consideration due unto us for this assurance, by the assured, at and after the rate of ———. In witness whereof we, the assurers, have subscribed our names and sums assured in ———."

The policy—its form and construction.

The insertion of the amount of the premium is not now (t) essential, but is usual, and the acknowledgment of receipt therein contained has been held conclusive between the assured and insurer in the absence of fraud (u). The insertion of the amount insured is required by the statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 7, and, in practice, the underwriter also usually annexes the date to his subscription. The same enactment requires the names of the subscribers and underwriters to be specified in or upon the policy (x). With this provision a subscription in the name of a firm or company is a sufficient compliance (y).

If the policy be executed by the underwriter as a binding instrument, there need not be a complete delivery of it to the assured (z).

Valuation Clause.—If the clause in the form as to value (a) is not filled up, it is an open policy. If it is filled up, it is a valued policy, and the valuation is, as we have seen, conclusive in the absence of fraud (b).

Suing and Labouring Clause.—The suing and labouring clause provides that "in case of any loss or misfortune, it shall be lawful to the assured, their factors, servants, and assigns, to sue, labour, and travel, in, for, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said goods, and merchandizes, and ship, &c., or any part thereof, without prejudice to the insurance; to the charges whereof we will contribute each one according to the rate and quantity of his sum herein assured." In Kidston v. Empire Insurance Co. (c), Willes, J., thus explains the object of this clause:

"If an occasion should occur in which, by reason of a peril insured against, unusual labour and expense are rendered necessary to prevent a loss for which the underwriters would be answerable, and such labour and expense is incurred accordingly, the underwriters will contribute, not as part of the sum insured in case of loss or damage, because it may be that a loss or damage for which they would be liable is averted by the labour bestowed, but as a contribution on their part as persons who have averted detriment by the result in proportion to what they would have had to pay if such detriment had come to a head for want of timely care. Take, for instance, the case of a policy on goods warranted free of average under 5 per cent., and the goods are wetted in a storm, which drives the ship into a port of distress, where by drying at an expense less than 5 per cent., the goods might be saved, or damaged under 5 per cent.; whilst, if not dried, they would decay and become damaged over 5 per cent., though existing in specie, so that freight would be payable. In this case there is no abandonment, and may be no prospect of one; and yet it is the duty of the master to use all reasonable means to preserve the goods, and obviously for the interest of the underwriters to encourage him in the performance of that duty by contributing to the expense incurred."

Comprehensive though the words of the suing and labouring clause are, they do not include, it has been held by the House of Lords, general average and salvage expenses (d). Nor will these words include expenses incurred not by the assured, but by underwriters who have re-insured (e).

Memorandum.—The memorandum was first introduced into policies about the year 1749 (f). It is inserted to protect the underwriter from liability to small averages, i.e., partial losses which might be claimed in respect of certain perishable commodities. It is as follows:— The policy—its form and construction.

"N.B.—Corn (g), fish, salt (h), fruit, flour, and seed are warranted free from average (i), unless general (j), or the ship be stranded (k). Sugar, tobacco, hemp, flax, hides, and skins are warranted free from average under five pounds per cent., and all other goods, also the ship (l) and freight, are warranted free from average under three pounds per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded."

This memorandum protects the underwriter from making good any partial loss whatever (m) upon the class of articles first specified, and any loss under five per cent. on the class secondly specified: unless, in either case, the loss were incurred in consequence of a general average, or the ship be stranded. The memorandum was inserted to get rid of the difficulty of discriminating between small losses by perils of the sea and those caused by tear and wear or deterioration, and to prevent disputes about trifling matters (n).

But the memorandum does not exclude expenses properly recoverable under the suing and labouring clause (o).

"The true construction of the policy, as reconciling and giving effect to all its provisions, is that the warranty against particular average does no more than limit the insurance to total loss of the freight by the perils insured against, without reference to extraordinary labour or expense which may be incurred by the assured in preserving the freight from loss, or rather from never becoming due, by reason of the operation of perils insured against; and that the latter expenses are specially provided for by the suing and labouring clause, and may be recovered thereunder" (p).

The reason of the exception where the ship has been stranded is, that, in such a case the underwriters agree to ascribe the loss to the stranding, as being the most probable occasion of the damage, though the fact cannot be ascertained; and, accordingly, it is now clearly settled, that every average or partial loss becomes a charge upon the underwriters, where a stranding has taken place, whether the loss has been in reality occasioned by the stranding or not (q). In consequence of this, the true sense of the word "stranding" has become a matter of importance. The rule laid down by Lord Tenterden in Wells v. Hopwood, and considered by him deducible from all the cases on the subject, is that—

"Where a vessel takes the ground in the ordinary and usual course of navigation and management in a tide, river or harbour, upon the ebbing of the tide, or from natural deficiency of water, so that she may float again upon the flow of tide or increase of water, such an event shall not be considered a stranding within the sense of the memorandum. But where the ground is taken under any extraordinary circumstances of time or place, by reason of some unusual or accidental occurrence, such an event shall be considered a stranding within the meaning of the memorandum" (r).

And his Lordship was further of opinion that the fact of the vessel's not receiving injury from such a grounding was of no consequence. In the case just cited, the ship was moored in a tide-harbour against the quay, with her head fastened to the opposite side of the harbour by a rope. At the first ebb she took the mud, but at the second the stretching of the rope and a strong wind caused her to ground upon a bank, where she was strained, and her seams opened, and she received some water, whereby the cargo was damaged, but at high tide they closed again, and the vessel was ultimately uninjured. These circumstances were held by three judges, Parke, J., dissentiente, to constitute a stranding within the meaning of the policy. In Kingsford v. Marshall (s), another case upon this subject, the vessel on the ebbing of the tide took the ground where it was intended that she should, but, in so doing, struck against some hard substance, which made two holes in her bottom, and damaged the cargo; this was held not to constitute such a stranding as would subject the underwriters to average; and Lord Chief Justice Tindal, in delivering judgment, mentioned the case of Wells v. Hopwood, and said it was decided on the principle that the taking the ground was occasioned by an extraneous and accidental cause; but that, in the case before him, the grounding was such as the master and crew intended, that is, merely by the ebbing of the tide in the ordinary course of navigation. These two instances will serve to show how nice the distinction between what is, and what is not, a stranding, has become (t). To constitute a stranding, the ship must be stationary: the striking on a rock, while the vessel remained a minute and a half only, was thought not to be a stranding, though she thereby received an injury which eventually proved fatal (u). The beaching of a vessel under unusual circumstances, by reason of some unusual occurrence, may be "stranding" within the meaning of the memorandum (v); though it is not necessary that the injury to the property insured, for which a compensation is claimed, should have been occasioned by the stranding, still that event must have happened before the risk upon the property insured had altogether determined. Thus, where the subject-matter of insurance consisted of hides, which were damaged by a peril of the sea so much that they were necessarily sold during the voyage, and the ship was afterwards stranded, it was held that the insured could not recover for a total loss, as he had not abandoned, and could not recover for an average loss as the hides were warranted "free of particular average, unless the ship be stranded," and the stranding had not taken place until the risk upon the hides has been determined (w). The stranding of a lighter, into which the goods had been transhipped for the purpose of landing them, is not such a stranding as will satisfy this condition, even although risk of craft be expressly guarded against by the policy (x).

(r) Cited and approved by Willes, J., in Mattos v. Saunders, L. R. 7 C. P. p. 581. See Corcoran v. Gurney, 1 E. & B. 456. In Letchford v. Oldham, 5 Q. B. D. 538, Brett, L. J., at p. 546, adopts the language of Tindal, C. J., in Kingsford v. Marshall, 8 Bing. 458, 463: "We think a stranding cannot be better defined than it has often been in several decided cases, namely, where the taking of the ground does not happen solely from those natural causes which are necessarily incident to the ordinary course of the navigation in which the ship is engaged, either wholly or in part, but from some accidental or extraneous cause."

The policy—its form and construction.

The underwriter is liable, under a voyage policy, if the aggregate of average losses during the voyage, however minute each average loss may be per se, come up to three per cent. in the whole on property warranted free from average under three per cent.; the Court, however, said that, perhaps, usage would be admissible to show that the contrary was intended: but there was no evidence of usage in the case before them (y). In a time policy, also, the different losses on the same goods or article during a particular voyage, may be added together; not so different losses on different voyages (z). In Price & Co. v. A1 Ships Small Damage Insurance Association (a), the Court of Appeal lately decided that general average and particular average losses, two essentially different losses, cannot be added together so as to make the underwriters liable notwithstanding the memorandum. The policy—its form and construction.

The distinction between a total loss of an integral part of the cargo, and a particular average guarded against by the memorandum, is pointed out in Hills v. London Assurance Corporation (b).

Stamp.—A policy of insurance made in this country ought to be duly stamped at the time when it is effected, and no policy can be pleaded or given unless duly stamped (c). Until recently it was unvailable unless so stamped (d). Now, by the Sea Insurances (Stamping of Policies) Amendment Act, 1876 (e), a policy, though not properly stamped, may be received in evidence upon payment of the duty and a penalty of £100, with £1 to the officer of the Court. The Commissioners may then stamp it with a denoting stamp. If, too, a policy upon distinct and separate interests of several persons bear a stamp in respect of the aggregate of such interests, it may be stamped in respect of each interest within a month after the last risk has been declared (f). Policies also of mutual insurance, i. e., policies by which divers persons agree to insure one another, may be stamped with additional stamps, if not underwritten to an amount exceeding the sum warranted by the former stamps (g). A policy of insurance made abroad need not be stamped, unless it be made by or on behalf of any person carrying on the business of insurance here, or under it, according to any stipulation agreement, or understanding expressed or implied, any loss, damage, or sum be payable or recoverable in this country. these cases the policy may be stamped within fourteen days after its receipt here, but not afterwards (h).

By the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 10, it is provided, that—

"Nothing in this Act shall extend, or be construed to extend, to prohibit the making of any alteration which may lawfully be made in the terms and conditions of any policy, after the same shall have been underwritten, provided that such alteration be made before notice of the determination of the risk originally insured, and that it shall not prolong the time covered by the insurance thereby made beyond the period of six months in the case of a policy made for a less period than six months, or beyond the period allowed by this Act in the case of a policy made for a greater period than six months, and that the articles insured shall remain the property of the same person or persons, and that no additional or further sum shall be insured by reason or means of such alteration."

A clause similar to this received a liberal interpretation (i). A mere extension of the time of sailing was held to be within it (k). So was a memorandum waiving the warranty of seaworthiness (l). Where a policy "on ship and outfit" was altered by inserting "ship and goods," it was held, that the insured could not recover on the policy as altered, for want of a new stamp (m), since the words "thing insured" required one identical and continued subject-matter of insurance; nor on the policy as it before stood, by reason of the alteration; but when the alteration in the subject-matter of insurance is to rectify a mere mistake, as where a broker, instructed to effect a policy on goods, effects it on ship, no new stamp is necessary (n). A memorandum to a policy on "hemp, marked R., and valued, with warranty to sail before August 20;" withdrawing the mark of the hemp and warranty of sailing, in consideration of four guineas, did not render an additional stamp necessary (o); nor did the alteration of a voyage from "Stockholm to Swinemunde," to one "from Stockholme to Swinemunde, Konigsberg, or Memel" (p); nor of a risk "at and from Liverpool to Quebec," to one "from Liverpool to St. John's, New Brunswick" (q).

The rate of stamp duty payable on policies of marine insurance is regulated by the same statute, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23 (r).

Warranties.—We now pass to the consideration of warranties.

"A warranty in a policy of insurance is a condition or a contingency, and unless that be performed there is no contract. It is perfectly immaterial for what purpose it was introduced; but, being inserted, the contract does not exist unless it be literally complied with" (s).

In this necessity for a literal compliance, it differs from a representation, which it is sufficient to perform substantially. Warranties are either express—i. e., appearing in the body or margin (t), or at the bottom (u) of the policy, or in some writing, which is by reference incorporated with it (x)—or implied, i. e., understood to exist in every policy unless expressly negatived. Anything may, of course, be expressly warranted; but those things which are most usually so are—

1. The time of sailing.
2. The safety of the ship at a particular time.
3. That she shall depart with convoy.
4. That the property is neutral.
5. Freedom from seizure in port.

Let us consider these in order.

The policy—its form and construction.

1. Time of Sailing.—When a ship is warranted to sail on a particular day, that means that she shall be upon her voyage on that day, for which purpose she must be completely unmoored; it will not be sufficient that she had her cargo on board, and was only prevented from sailing by stress of weather (y). But if she bonâ fide set sail for the purpose of completing her voyage, that will be enough (z), although she be detained beyond that day at another part of the same river or territory; ex. gr., by an embargo (a) or by stress of weather. It must, however, be observed, that a warranty to sail is not complied with by a vessel's raising her anchor, getting under sail and moving onwards, unless, at the time of performing these acts, she has everything ready for the performance of the voyage, and these acts are done as the commencement of it, nothing remaining to be done afterwards (b). For instance, if she have not her clearances, or have not taken in her entire cargo, she cannot be said to have sailed within the meaning of the warranty. Nor must her sailing be a merely colourable one, for the purpose of complying with the letter of the warranty, and not in real furtherance of the intended voyage (c). If the warranty be to depart, or to "sail from a place," which seems to bear the same sense as depart (d), it is necessary not only that the ship should set "sail on the voyage," but also that she should be out of port on or before the day (e). To sail is to set sail on the voyage; to depart is to depart from some particular place.

2. Safety of a Ship on a particular Day.—We have already observed (f) that a warranty of the safety of the ship on a particular day is often inserted, in order to restrain the force of the expressions "lost or not lost," and that if the ship be safe at any time in that day the warranty is complied with (g).

The policy—its form and construction.

3. To depart with Convoy.—This is a warranty usual in time of war. A convoy is a naval force under the command of a person appointed by the government of the country to which the vessel insured belongs. The appointment by government is essential; for a ship of war accidentally bound on the same voyage with the vessel insured, is not a sufficient convoy (h). But a convoy appointed by the admiral commanding in chief on a foreign station is one appointed by government (i). The terms of the warranty are, sometimes, to depart with convoy, at other times with convoy for the voyage. These two forms of expression mean precisely the same, and render a departure with convoy for the voyage necessary (k). But, as it sometimes happens that government appoints a convoy to accompany the ships for part only of their voyage, and then to be succeeded by another, or to detach a portion of itself from the main body, to bring them up to a particular point; the warranty will be complied with if the vessel sail with the first convoy, and proceed with the force so appointed or detached (l). Indeed, as government alone can appoint convoys, the question whether a convoy be or be not sufficient must, to a great extent, depend upon its orders (m). It may be impossible to procure a convoy, either precisely from the port of departure or precisely to that of destination (n). In such cases the rule is, that if the vessel sail with convoy from the place of rendezvous appointed for vessels bound from her lading port, and to the nearest point to which she can be conducted by the convoy appointed for vessels going to her place of destination, that is sufficient. A warranty to depart with convoy is not complied with unless the master, if by due diligence he can, obtain sailing instructions before the ship leaves the place of rendezvous; for the value of convoy, in a great measure, arises from its taking the ships under control as well as protection; but that control cannot commence till sailing instructions have been obtained, nor can it be enforced otherwise than by their means (o). Moreover, the meaning of the warranty is, that the ship shall not only depart with convoy, but keep with it during the whole voyage, except in cases of absolute impossibility, such as being driven by a tempest to some foreign port, where no convoy can be had (p).

4. Neutral Property.—In war time it is also usual to warrant the subject of insurance to be neutral property, which only means that it is neutral at the commencement of the risk, not that it shall continue so during the rest of the voyage (q). Indeed, if the ship forfeit her neutrality by the misconduct of those on board, the warranty will have been broken as to her (r); for when a ship is warranted neutral, that means, first, that she shall belong to the subject of a neutral state (s); and secondly, that she shall be navigated according to the law of nations, and the particular treaties subsisting between the country to which she belongs and the belligerents. Therefore, if by such a treaty it have been agreed that those ships only shall be considered neutral which are furnished with particular documents—e. g., passport, sea-letter, register—whoever warrants her neutrality must take care that she have those documents on board (t); but it is not necessary that she should be navigated in conformity to the ex parte ordinance of one of the belligerents, in which her own nation has not concurred (x); the belligerent has only the right of demanding proof that the property is exempt from capture (y). The sentence of a foreign Court of Admiralty, or other Court having competent jurisdiction over questions of prize, and adjudging the vessel to be good prize, on a ground within their jurisdiction, will, if such ground falsify the warranty (z), be conclusive evidence that it has been broken; and that, though it appear on the face of such sentence that the Court arrived at its conclusion through rules of evidence established by particular ordinances of its own country, and inadmissible on general principles (a). But if the ground of condemnation be stated obscurely (b), or the sentence adjudge the ship prize, not because she was enemy's property, but for reasons leading to a contrary conclusion (c); or if it appear that it was founded solely on the violation of an ex parte ordinance to which the neutral state had not assented (d); in such cases, the sentence is not conclusive evidence of a breach of the warranty (e).

5. Freedom from Seizure in Port of Discharge.—A warranty is sometimes inserted to exempt the underwriters from responsibility in case of confiscation, seizure, or capture in port, or the consequences of any attempt thereat (f). Sometimes the clause is not confined to port. The principal difficulties which arise on this warranty are, What constitutes "capture" or "seizure"? and When is a seizure, properly speaking, in port? The disposition is to hold the word "port" to include any place where the vessel was intended to be discharged (g); but if a vessel, when seized, be neither within the caput portûs, nor within that part of the haven where ships usually unload, the underwriter is not discharged by this warranty (h). Whether the vessel was at her port of discharge or not, is a question entirely for the jury (i). It was ruled at nisi prius by Gibbs, C. J., in O'Reilly v. Royal E. Assurance Co. (k), that where this warranty is inserted, the underwriters are discharged, if the insured deviate from the usual course of the voyage in order to avoid the expected peril (k). This doctrine appears hard on the insured, who, it was ruled by the same learned judge, would be entitled to recover if there were no warranty (l), and cannot be considered to be law (m).

(f) This is sometimes not confined to the port, but general. See Powell v. Hyde, 5 E. & B. 607. "Capture" is defined as "a taking by armed force from without, with intent to deprive the owner of the possession and property of the thing captured": Arnould,

Besides the above usual warranties, the policy generally contains other special warranties; e. g., in case of cargoes of animals "free from mortality and jettison" (n), "free from all average arising from jettison or leakage" (o).

Implied Warranties.—The implied warranties are—

1. Not to deviate.
2. Seaworthiness.
3. That the insured will use reasonable diligence to guard against the risks covered by the policy.

The policy—its form and construction.

1. Not to deviate.—A deviation from the proper course and track of the voyage insured (q) discharges the underwriter, not ab initio, but from the time of the deviation; so that he is liable for any damage which had previously accrued (r), but is freed from subsequent responsibility. It matters not that the risk has not been enhanced by the deviation (s).

A deviation happens where there is a wilful and unnecessary departure from the due course of the voyage, for any, even the shortest, time. Thus, if the master touch at a port for a purpose unconnected with the voyage (t); or at a port not in the course of the voyage, though only a few leagues out of the way; or one at which it is not usual to touch, although the ship must pass it (u); or stay an unreasonable time at the place where the policy attaches (x), or a place where the ship has liberty to stay (y); or for a purpose foreign to the voyage (z); or if, when there are several tracks, he select one in particular for a purpose foreign to the voyage, instead of that which is safest and most eligible (a); or having liberty to touch at one port, touch at another (b); or touch at the port mentioned in this liberty, but for an unauthorized purpose (c): All these are deviations, and though there is no objection to a policy on part of a voyage (d), U. S. 383. In the case of a seeking ship a reasonable time for the purposes of the adventure, to be determined by the state of things at the port where the ship happens to be, must be allowed. That state of things may render the time of the detention unusual, yet it will not discharge the underwriters, unless it be also unreasonable: Phillips v. Irving, 7 M. & G. 325.

yet if a policy be on the whole voyage, a deviation, which happened even before the making of the policy, will be fatal (e). In determining whether there has been a deviation, regard is always to be paid to the object of the voyage, and the usage of trade with respect to such voyages (f). Thus, if it be usual to stop long at a port, or to go out of the way, the underwriter is considered as understanding that usage (g). But, as has been frequently observed, no usage can be set up against the express language of a policy: and the policy often, in express terms, grants liberty to the insured to perform acts which, but for that liberty, would amount to deviations (h).

Care must be taken not to exceed the liberty (i); and even an express liberty is construed with reference to the main object of the voyage. Thus, under a liberty to touch and stay at any port or ports whatever, the stay must be for some purpose connected with the furtherance of the adventure (k). Where a ship was insured from Lisbon to England, with liberty to call at any one port in Portugal, it was held that this must mean some port in the course of the voyage to England (l); and, as we have seen that a voyage to A., B., and C. means a voyage to them in the order mentioned in the policy (m), so where liberty is given to touch at several specified ports, they must, if more than one be visited, be taken in the order named in the policy (n). Nor must the stay at any specified ports be unreasonable (p); but when a ship has liberty to touch at a port, she has also liberty to trade there, provided that no extra delay be thereby occasioned (q).

If the vessel, in time of war, cruise for a prize (r), that is a deviation, unless she have express liberty to do so: a liberty to chase is different from one to cruise for prizes; and a liberty to chase, capture, and man, will not justify a lying-in-wait nine days for a prize (s), nor a delay for the purpose of bringing her, when captured, into port: in order to that, there should be a liberty to convoy prizes (t). A liberty to cruise for six weeks, means for six weeks successively (u).

An unreasonable delay in sailing to the port or place at which the risk is to commence is in the nature of a deviation, and discharges the underwriter (x). So is an abandonment or change of voyage, and the underwriter is discharged from the moment the purpose of so changing the voyage is definitively formed. The distinction between deviation and abandonment is, that in the former the original voyage described in the policy is not given up, and the terminus ad quem not altered; in the latter, it is (y). But the policy will not be avoided by a mere intention to deviate, never carried into effect (z). There are circumstances under which an actual deviation will be excused; these are, where the deviation is occasioned by necessity, or some imperative obligation, ex. gr., to take in provisions to save the crew from starving, or procure repairs for the safety of the ship; for there is a liberty implied in every policy to do that which is necessary for the preservation of the vessel and the lives of those on board her (a). But if the vessel was unseaworthy when she sailed, and went out of her course to repair original defects, this would be a deviation (b).

The ordinary occasions by which a deviation is justified, are,—To join convoy, for it may be a measure of necessary prudence; and a captain, unless expressly prohibited, may always do when insured what it would be necessary to do if uninsured (c); Stress of weather (d); Want of repairs (e); The approach of an enemy (f); Lastly, Mutiny, desertion, sickness of the crew, or any other inevitable accident (g); for instance, when the vessel was carried out of her course by a King's ship (h). But, though necessity will justify a deviation, yet it is plain, on principles of common sense as well as law, that such necessity must not have been occasioned by the insured's own fault (i), and that the voyage of necessity must be pursued in the shortest and most expeditious manner. The doubt which existed as to the right of vessels to deviate to succour the distressed is set at rest by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Scaramanga v. Stamp (k), which decides that deviation for the purpose of saving life is justifiable, but that a deviation for the mere purpose of saving property is not so; and where the former cannot be accomplished without also incidentally effecting the latter object there will be no deviation.

says Baron Parke (m), "there is not the least question but that there is an implied warranty of seaworthiness at the commencement of the risk: that is, at the port where the assurance is 'at and from,' at the beginning of a voyage when it is 'from' a port." He also adds,

The policy—its form and construction.

"It is undoubted law, that there is an implied warranty, with respect to a policy for a voyage, that the ship should be seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, or in port when preparing for it, or had been seaworthy when the voyage had commenced, if the insurance is on a vessel already at sea; which, being commensurate with the risk insured, is compendiously described as a warranty of seaworthiness at the commencement of the risk" (n).

If, therefore, a ship be unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage the policy will be voided, even though the defect be remedied before loss (o). It matters not that the assured was ignorant of the defects, or that the loss did not occur by reason of them; a breach of this warranty will avoid the policy.

Seaworthiness is a relative term, which is to be construed according to the situation of the ship and the voyage (p): thus, if she was in port or river, it means that she was in a condition to render her reasonably safe in such a port or river; and therefore, if she be insured at and from it, she may be protected while in the port, though in want of repairs (q). Where the assured is bound to have the ship seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, he is bound to have her properly equipped with sails (r) and anchors (s), with a sufficient crew (t) and a master of competent skill and ability to navigate her when she sails at the commencement of the voyage (u); and if she sail from a port where there is an establishment of pilots, and the nature of the navigation requires one, the master must take a pilot on board (v).

Seaworthiness is a term which always refers to the service in which the ship is engaged (x). Therefore a vessel may be seaworthy if designed for one service, which would not be so if designed for another (x). A ship may be seaworthy in a sense to satisfy the warranty implied in a policy on the ship, and yet it may not be so in a policy on the goods or cargo. Thus, in Daniells v. Harris (y), where there was a policy on deck cargo, it was no proof of seaworthiness that the deck cargo could be readily jettisoned in bad weather, and that thus lightened the vessel would be fit to meet bad weather. So, likewise, is the warranty to be construed relatively to the character and capacity of the vessel itself (z), and to the subject-matter of insurance (a). The general rule is, that if the ship be not seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, the policy will be avoided. It has been suggested that an exception exists in cases where the unseaworthiness results from a mistake or accident, which is remedied as soon as it is discovered, and before any loss has been occasioned by it (b). The existence of this exception, how-

On the question, in what cases the warranty would be broken by not having a pilot, see Phillips v. Headlam, 2 B. & Ad. 380; Law v. Hollingsworth, 7 T. R. 160. ever, has been questioned in Quebec Marine Insurance Co. v. Commercial Bank of Canada (c), and it is open to grave doubts. The policy—its form and construction.

The warranty of seaworthiness does not apply to any period except the commencement of the risk (d). In the case of Sadler v. Dixon (e), where the underwriters were held responsible for the loss of the ship, occasioned by the wilful (but not barratrous) act of the master and crew in throwing overboard the ballast, Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said:—

"The great principle established by the more recent decisions, is, that if the vessel, crew, and equipments be originally sufficient, the assured has done all that he contracted to do, and is not responsible for the subsequent deficiency occasioned by any neglect or misconduct of the master or crew; and this principle prevents many nice and difficult inquiries, and causes a more complete indemnity to the assured, which is the object of the contract of insurance."

This judgment was afterwards affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber (e).

Where there are different stages of navigation necessitating different equipments or states of seaworthiness, the warranty of seaworthiness implies that the vessel is in all respects seaworthy at the commencement of each stage—one crew may be necessary at one part of the voyage and another at another; and there must, therefore, be a sufficient crew at the commencement of each stage. The policy in Bouillon v. Lupton (f) was on vessels "at and from Lyons to Galatz." The vessels were fit to navigate the Rhone from Lyons to Marseilles; but when they left Lyons they were not, and from the nature of the navigation of the river could not be, provided with masts, sails, &c., required for the voyage to Galatz. In other words, they necessarily completed the river voyage in a state unfit to make the sea voyage. Willes, J., points out that the warranty of seaworthiness must have different meanings as applied to different portions of the same voyage, and states that it is sufficient if the vessel answers the warranty at and for each stage of the voyage. It is obvious that the necessity for a pilot can only be an occasional one (f). But, generally speaking, it is sufficient if the vessel be seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage.

If a vessel founders shortly after leaving port, or becomes unable to continue her voyage, in the absence of any external circumstances to account for the disaster, the legal presumption is shifted, and the natural inference is that it arose from defects existing at the time of sailing (g). But this is no presumption of law; it will be for the jury to consider the lapse of time, any relevant facts, and the whole circumstances.

This implied warranty, however, may be, and sometimes is, dispensed with by an admission of the fact of seaworthiness, or an agreement on the part of the underwriters in the policy that the ship shall be considered to be seaworthy; and in the absence of fraud they will be liable, though the vessel sink from unseaworthiness the day after the policy was effected (h). The exclusion of the implied warranty must be in clear terms (i). The fact that the perils enumerated included "rottenness, inherent defects, and other seaworthiness," is insufficient to exclude this warranty (j).

With respect to a time policy, which is usually effected when the ship is at sea, or in a position where the owner can have no means of knowing her state or complying with such a condition, no warranty of seaworthiness can be implied (k).

"It is a maxim of our insurance law, and of the insurance law of all commercial nations, that the assured cannot seek an indemnity for a loss produced by their own wrongful act" (m).

The policy—its form and construction.

Thus, the assurer must not, in the case of a time policy on a ship where no warranty of seaworthiness is implied, knowingly and wilfully send her to sea in an unseaworthy and dangerous state (n). So he must take care, in case of a policy on ship, that she be documented according to her national character, for every ship must have some national character. The underwriters will not be liable, if a loss happen from the default of the insured in either of these respects (o) in being unprovided with those documents, which are required by the general law of nations or by particular treaties. Thus, as the carrying of simulated papers is an offence against the law of nations, if a ship carry them and be condemned on that ground, the warranty of documentation is infringed, and the underwriters are not liable (p). But, as in the case of express warranty of neutral property, so in the cases now under consideration, disobedience to the mere ex parte ordinance of a foreign state does not vitiate the policy (q).

There is this difference between an express warranty of the ship's national character, and that which we are now considering, viz., that in the case of an express warranty, if the ship be not properly documented at the time of sailing, the underwriters are discharged (r); whereas a breach of the implied warranty does not discharge the underwriter, unless a loss actually happen in consequence (s).

The policy—its form and construction.

The obligation to have the ship properly documented may be waived, as, for instance, by a liberty to carry simulated papers (t). Nor is any warranty of documentation implied in an insurance upon goods (u), unless they belong to the owner of the ship, for then there is (x).

It was supposed that the underwriter might be exempt from a loss of goods stowed on deck upon the above ground, that such loss had happened by the merchant's own default. But the Court of Queen's Bench decided that the mere unexplained fact of their being so stowed is not in se conclusive of such a default (y).

the implied stipulation for the evidences and insignia of the national character of the vessel does not discharge the underwriter from all subsequent liability. So far as any enhancement of the risk in this respect is imputable to the insured, he must bear the consequent loss; the insurers at the same time continuing to be liable in other respects." See Bell v. Carstairs, 14 East, 374, per Lord Ellenborough, and Price v. Bell, 1 East, 663. It has been sometimes said, as in Bell v. Carstairs, ubi supra, that there was no warranty of documentation; but that, I think, can only be understood to mean no express warranty; for it seems clear that the cases support the opinion in Lord Campbell's notes to Pipon v. Cope, 1 Camp. 434, that the insured impliedly warrants to guard the insurer with reasonable diligence against the risks insured; and that, if a loss happen in consequence of insufficient documentation, that implied warranty will be broken, and the breach a defence. Perhaps the nature of the implied warranty under which these cases fall would be more correctly expressed by saying that the insured warrants that a loss shall not happen through his own default. Thus, in Hollingworth v. Brodrick, 7 Ad. & E. 40, we find Lord Denman saying, "I own I feel a doubt whether, if it were distinctly averred that the ship had, by gross negligence, been brought during the voyage to a condition in which she would not be insurable, that might not be a defence. It is certainly a new and perhaps a dangerous one, but I think that, if it were clearly made out, the assured could not say that the loss was by perils insured against." See Thompson v. Hopper, E. B. & E. 1038, overruling S. C., 6 E. & B. 937. In some cases the question may be, whether the loss arose from any peril insured against, or from the vice of the subject of insurance: see Fawcus v. Sarsfield, 6 E. & B. 192; Dudgeon v. Pembroke, 2 App. Cas. 284.

Section V.—Results of Contract.

Results of contract.

Having now finished our consideration of the form and construction of the contract, we proceed to inquire respecting its results; this will, of course, be either the safety or loss of the thing insured. In case of its safety, little matter for discussion arises. In case of loss by any of the perils insured against, the first consideration is, whether the loss be a total or a partial one; for, as insurance is substantially a contract of indemnity (z), the insured, if he have suffered only a partial loss, will be entitled only to a partial payment from the insurer. The distinction is also important in regard to goods insured "free from average," that is, goods for which the underwriter is liable only in case of total loss. We will now inquire respecting the distinction between these two classes of loss, and what is, properly speaking, a total loss, what only a partial one.

Total loss.—A total loss is of two sorts—(1) actual, or (2) constructive, that is, such as may be rendered total by notice of abandonment. By abandonment is meant a relinquishment to the insurer of whatever may be saved. Abandonment is not peculiar to policies of marine insurance, but is an incident of every contract of indemnity. A person claiming under such a contract must abandon all his right in respect of that for which he receives indemnity, the object being to prevent the insured from reaping an undue advantage under the contract. Accordingly, a person insured under a policy of marine insurance must, upon payment by the underwriter for a total loss, actual or constructive, abandon anything that remains of the subject of insurance (a). Notice of abandonment seems to be peculiar to contracts of marine insurance. In the case of actual total loss, no notice of abandonment is necessary; but it is necessary, in the case of a constructive total loss, unless it be excused (b).

(z) See Burnand v. Rodocanachi, 7 App. Cas. 333.

(b) Kaltenbach v. Mackenzie, ubi supra, per Brett, L. J.

Results of contract.

When notice of abandonment has been given, a constructive total loss is as much a total loss as an actual total loss. Thus it will form the subject of a claim under a policy against "total loss only" (e).

A total loss of the former description takes place, when no part of the subject-matter of insurance exists in the hands, or for the benefit, of the insured, or in such a state as to be fit for any useful purpose (f). Thus, the loss will be total, per se, not merely if the ship insured be consumed by fire, or destroyed by perils of the sea, or by some other means cease to exist in specie; but also, in case of seizure, detention, barratry, if the dominion of the seizors continue, adverse sale by a Court of Admiralty, and so forth, the loss is total without abandonment (g). It appears to be settled that a partial loss only, due to a peril insured against, is not converted into a total loss by a subsequent sale, even by a Court of competent jurisdiction.

"I know of no such head in insurance law," says Bayley, J., in Gardner v. Salvador (h), "as loss by sale."

The true rule appears to be that established in De Mattos v. Saunders (i). A cargo of salt was shipped from Liverpool to Calcutta warranted "free from average, unless general, or the ship be stranded." The vessel was injured, and was taken in tow by salvors and stranded; the salt was landed in a damaged condition, and, if sold, it would have realized no profit. Suits were instituted in the Admiralty Court by the salvors, and the salt was sold under a decree, the entire proceeds being absorbed by the costs. It was held by the Court of Common Pleas (Willes, J., and Keating, J.), that there was not an actual total loss. Willes, J., in delivering judgment, said:

"The contention that the loss, partial at the time it was incurred, was converted into a total loss by the acts of the salvors, and the seizure and sale under the orders of the Court of Admiralty, must fail, because those acts and proceedings were not the natural and necessary consequences of a peril insured against. The assured is entitled to recover from the underwriters for a loss arising from sea damage and its proximate consequences; but it is not a proximate consequence of sea damage in general that there should be proceedings in the Court of Admiralty. A link is wanting. As well might it be said that a proceeding by salvors setting up a false claim would convert a partial into a total loss; which would be absurd. There was no natural connection between the sea damage here and the seizure and sale under the decree of the Admiralty Court" (j).

If, however, there has been a constructive total loss owing to a peril insured against, the subsequent sale by a Court of competent jurisdiction converts the constructive total loss into an actual total loss, so as to dispense with notice of abandonment. Thus, if a ship has been seized or captured, there is a constructive total loss of the ship and cargo by a peril insured against, namely, capture or seizure (k); and if afterwards the ship or cargo is sold by a Court of competent jurisdiction, the loss is converted into an actual total loss of the ship or cargo.

In the recent case of Cossman v. West (l) the facts proved were these: a ship was deserted by her master and crew, who had previously injured her and left her in a sinking condition. Afterwards the ship was taken possession of by salvors, towed into port, and there sold, by order of the Admiralty Court, for less than the actual cost of the salvage services. The Privy Council held that after the sale there was an actual total loss.

"If it," say the Privy Council, "is lost to the owner by an adverse valid and legal transfer of his right of property and possession to a purchaser by a sale under a decree of a Court of competent jurisdiction, in consequence of a peril insured against, it is as much a total loss as if it had been totally annihilated" (m).

(m) At pp. 169, 170, citing Mullett v. Shedden, supra.

Results of contract.

And the case of De Mattos v. Saunders (n) was thus distinguished:—

"In that case the vessel does not appear to have been abandoned by the master and crew, whereas in this case the vessel was a derelict, a term legally applied to a ship which is abandoned and deserted at sea by the master and crew without any intention on their part of returning to her. It is not like the case of a vessel which is left by her master and crew temporarily with the distinct intention of returning to it. In such a case the ship is not abandoned, and therefore is not derelict, though the master may have given up the entire management to the salvors. In the case of salvors there is a distinction between a derelict and a vessel which, though in great danger, has not been abandoned by the master and crew. In the case of a derelict, the salvors who first take possession have not only a maritime lien on the ship for salvage services, but they have the entire and absolute control of the vessel, and no one can interfere with them except in the case of manifest incompetence; but in an ordinary case of disaster, when the master remains in command he retains the possession of the ship. So, unless a vessel is derelict, the salvors have not the right as against the master to the exclusive possession of it, even though he should have left it temporarily, but they are bound, on the master's returning and claiming charge of the vessel, to give it up to him. In the present case, the vessel being a derelict, the salvors had the exclusive possession and control of it up to the time of the sale, and were not bound to give it up until they had been remunerated for the salvage services. Assuming that their possession constituted a constructive total loss, but not an absolute total loss, and that there was still a chance that the vessel might be redeemed and restored, the sale under the decree of the Court removed, as Lord Abinger remarked in Roux v. Salvador (o), all speculation upon that subject, and entitled the plaintiff to treat the case as one of total loss without abandonment. The salvage services, if not a peril insured against, were an immediate and necessary consequence of a peril insured against, whether of barratry or a peril of the sea."

Even where a total loss has occurred by the sale of the goods, a question may possibly arise, whether the assured has not, by electing to take the proceeds instead of making his claim on the underwriters, forfeited his claim to recover for a total loss, if he have thereby altered the position of the facts, so as to affect the interests of the underwriter (p). Results of contract.

Though it has been said that a loss by perils of the sea cannot be total if the thing exists in specie, yet that must be taken only to mean, if it exist for any useful purpose; for if a ship be so battered as to be rather a congeries of planks than a ship (q), or if the cargo be so damaged as to exist only in the shape of a nuisance (r), in such cases the loss is total without abandonment. It was indeed decided by the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of Roux v. Salvador (s), that where the property continues to exist and be of some value under its original denomination, but is sold on account of the impossibility of preserving it up to the termination of the voyage, the insured, if they desire to treat the loss as total, must abandon. That decision was, however, reversed in the Exchequer Chamber, and the rule laid down in the judgment there delivered is as follows:—

"If goods once damaged by the perils of the sea, and necessarily landed before the termination of the voyage, are, by reason of that damage, in such a state, though the species be not utterly destroyed, that they cannot with safety be reshipped into the same or any other vessel; if it be certain that, before the termination of the original voyage, the species itself would disappear, and the goods assume a new form, losing all their original character; if, though imperishable, they are in the hands of strangers, not under the control of the assured; if, by any circumstances over which he has no control, they can never, or within no assignable period, be brought to their original destination;—in any of these cases, the circumstance of their existing in specie at that forced termination of the risk is of no importance. The loss is, in its nature, total to him who has no means of recovering his goods, whether his inability arises from their annihilation or from any other insuperable obstacle (t). . . . Their destruction (i. e., of the hides, the goods there in question) not being consummated at the time they were taken out of the vessel, they became in that state a salvage for the benefit of the party who was to sustain the loss, and were accordingly sold, and the facts of the loss and the sale were made known at the same time to the assured. Neither he nor the underwriters could at that time exercise any control over them, or by any interference alter the consequences. It appears to us, therefore, that this is not the case of what has been called a constructive loss, but of an absolute total loss of the goods. They never could arrive, and at the same moment when the intelligence of the loss arrived all speculation was at an end" (x).

In Roux v. Salvador, also, the Exchequer Chamber distinctly indicated the instances in which notice of abandonment must be given, in these words:—

"But there are intermediate cases,—there may be a capture, which, though primâ facie a total loss, may be followed by a recapture, which would re-vest the property in the assured. There may be a forcible detention, which may speedily terminate, or may last so long as to end in the impossibility of bringing the ship or the goods to their destination. There may be some other peril, which renders the ship unnavigable without any reasonable hope of repair (y), or by which the goods are partly lost, or so damaged that they are not worth the expense of bringing them, or what remains of them, to their destination (z). In all these, or any similar cases, if a prudent man, not insured, would decline any further expense in prosecuting an adventure, the termination of which will probably never be successfully accomplished, a party insured may, for his own benefit as well as that of the underwriter, treat the case as one of a total loss, and demand the full sum insured (a). But if he elects to do this, as the thing insured, or a portion of it, still exists and is vested in him, the very principle of the indemnity requires (b) that he should make a cession of all his right to the recovery of it, and that, too, within a reasonable time after he receives the intelligence of the accident, that the under-writer may be entitled to all the benefit of what may still be of any value, and that he may, if he pleases, take measures at his own cost for realising or increasing that value. In all these cases not only the thing assured, or part of it, is supposed to exist in specie, but there is a possibility, however remote, of its arriving at its destination, or at least of its value being in some way affected by the measures that may be adopted for the recovery or preservation of it. If the assured prefers the chance of any advantage that may result to him beyond the value insured, he is at liberty to do so (c); but then he must also abide the risk of the arrival of the thing insured in such a state as to entitle him to no more than a partial loss" (d). Results of contract.

Consequently, if there be nothing to cede of which the insurer can avail himself, notice of abandonment is unnecessary (e); but, if "the thing insured subsists in specie, and there is a chance of its recovery, there must be an abandonment (i. e., notice of abandonment)" (f).

When the loss is not total per se, the right to abandon depends on its amount. The doctrine formerly held on this subject was, as succinctly stated in 2 Wms. Saund. 203 c., note 19, that, when the voyage was lost, or the expense of pursuing it exceeded the benefit arising from it, and, therefore, it was not worth pursuing, in such case the insured might abandon (g). But this doctrine is narrowed by later decisions (h), and it does not seem possible to imagine a case in which the loss of the voyage, independently of some great jeopardy affecting the subject-matter of insurance, would entitle the assured to abandon (f). The insurance is not on the voyage, but on the ship for the voyage or the time specified (g).

The test as to constructive loss of ship laid down by Story, J., in Peele v. The Merchants' Insurance Co. (h), is:—

"The right of abandonment has been admitted to exist where there is a forcible dispossession or ouster of the owner of the ship, as in cases of capture; where there is a moral restraint or detention which deprives the owner of the free use of his ship, as in case of embargoes, blockades, and arrests by sovereign authority (i); where there is a present total loss of the physical possession and use of the ship, as in case of submersion; where there is a total loss of the ship from the voyage, as in case of shipwreck, so that the ship cannot be repaired for the voyage in the port where the disaster happens; and, lastly, where the injury is so extensive that by reason of it the ship is useless, and yet the necessary repairs would exceed her present value."

In determining what is a constructive total loss of goods, the question appears to be whether, after expending money in transhipping, drying, &c., the goods could have been sent to the port of destination at less than their selling value on arrival (j).

In cases in which the law requires an abandonment, "not only the thing assured or part of it is supposed to exist in specie, but there is a possibility, however remote, of its arriving at its destination, or at least of its value being in some way affected by the measures that may be adopted for the recovery or preservation of it" (k).

In Young v. Turing (l), in which notice of abandonment had been given, the ship was cast away upon the Goodwin Sands, but might have been re-fitted. The Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas told the jury that they were to say whether, under all the circumstances attending the ship (among which was her national character), a man of prudence and discretion uninsured would have repaired her or not; that, if he would, the loss was partial; if he would not, total. And that, in determining this question, they were to take as the value of the ship her real value, not the sum at which she was valued in the policy (m). This direction was upheld by the Exchequer Chamber, and in a similar case received the sanction of the House of Lords (n).

This question is not to be decided by the result, but should be confined to the spot and time of the commencement of the repairs: and the jury should say whether, when the repairs were commenced, the owner, if on the spot and uninsured, and acting prudently, would not have repaired; for it may be that, as the repairs went on, the defects proved to be greater than was originally supposed; and that it was then worth while to incur a still greater expenditure rather than sell the ship partially repaired, and lose the benefit of the sum already laid out (o). And even if the owner be entitled to abandon, yet if the captain, having repaired injudiciously, prosecute the adventure, and earn the freight, though it be swallowed up by a bottomry bond, the underwriters on freight are not liable for it, inasmuch as it has not in fact been lost (p).

When the insured are entitled to abandon, and think proper (for they are in no case obliged) to do so, they must give notice of abandonment within a reasonable time (o). However, it is sufficient if notice be given within a reasonable time after the insured have received intelligence of the loss, and had an opportunity of ascertaining the extent of damage (p).

"The law that has been laid down is, that immediately the assured has reliable information of such damage to the subject-matter of insurance as that there is imminent danger of its becoming a total loss, then he must at once, unless there is some reason to the contrary, give notice of abandonment; but if the information which he first receives is not sufficient to enable him to say whether there is that imminent danger, then he has a reasonable time to acquire full information as to the state and nature of the damage done to the ship" (q).

Notice of abandonment need not be given to the underwriters of a policy of re-insurance (r).

An abandonment cannot be partial: it must be of the whole thing insured, unless in effect there are separate insurances of particular articles or parcels (s). It must also be unconditional, at least, unless the underwriter think proper to accept a conditional one (t). It must be express, too, and positive, though the word "abandon" need not be used (u). A request to the underwriter to give directions for the disposition of the effects insured, and to settle for a total loss, was in one case held not sufficient (v).

But the underwriter may waive an informality in the notice of abandonment by his acquiescence (w), though he will not do this merely by lying by and making no objection to it; for he is not bound to signify his acceptance of an abandonment, though if he once accept it he becomes liable for a total loss (x). The abandonment may be by parol (y); but it must be given by the assured or a person authorized by him to give it (z). Once given and accepted by the underwriter, a notice of abandonment is irrevocable (a). Such acceptance may be proved by words or conduct, and is, as a rule, a question of fact (b).

The effect of an abandonment is to divest the property of the thing abandoned out of the insured, and vest it in the insurer, for whom the former becomes a trustee (c). In Castellain v. Preston (d), Brett, L. J., thus defines the extent of the insurer's right:

"As between the underwriter and the assured, the underwriter is entitled to the advantage of every right of the assured, whether such right consists in contract, fulfilled or unfulfilled, or in remedy for tort capable of being insisted upon, or already insisted on, or in any other right, whether by way of condition or otherwise, legal or equitable, which can be, or has been, exercised or has accrued; and whether such right could or could not be enforced by the insurer in the name of the assured, by the exercise or acquiring of which right or condition the loss against which the assured is insured can be, or has been, diminished."

Hence, freight which is actually earned, or which may be subsequently earned, passes to the insurer (e), though the insurers, of course, receive only the balance remaining after deducting the necessary expenses incurred by the assured in the preservation of the property abandoned (f). Damages recovered from the owners of the wrong-doing ship for loss of freight not earned by reason of a collision (g), or freight earned by transhipping the cargo and conveying it in another vessel (h), do not pass to the insurer. The underwriters will be subrogated to no rights which the assurer had not. Thus (i), where two ships of the same owner came into collision, the underwriters of the vessel which was lost paid the insurance, and claimed to rank pari passu with the owners of cargo destroyed in the distribution of the fund lodged in Court. It was held that they had no such right under the circumstances of the case.

"The right of the underwriters," said Lord Cairns, L. C., "is merely to make such claim for damages as the insured himself could have made, and it is for this reason that they would have to make it in his name; and if this be so, it cannot of course be made against the insured himself" (k).

While the insurer is subrogated to the rights of the assured, he becomes subject to all liabilities as owner of the ship or goods; e.g., the liability to pay salvage reward or freight (l). The better opinion seems to be that the assured cannot, by abandonment, transfer to the underwriters ownership so as to subject them to subsequent liabilities against their immediate disclaimer of such transfer (m).

It ought to be observed here, before quitting the head of total loss, that there may be a total loss of an integral portion of the cargo. As where the insurance was on several hogsheads of sugar, and each hogshead was separately valued and insured, a loss of one of them was held to be a total loss of that hogshead (n); or where the insurance is general, but upon articles entirely different from each other (o). On the other hand, where a part of each hogshead was saved, the jury having stated their opinion that the loss was an average, the Court held them right in so doing (p); and where memorandum goods are shipped in distinct packages, but there is no separate valuation and insurance of each, the loss of several entire packages has been held by the Court of Exchequer Chamber to be an average one, and covered by the memorandum (q). The distinction between the two classes of cases is explained in that case and also in Hills v. London Assurance Corporation (r), where, a portion of a cargo of wheat shipped in bulk having been pumped out with water in foul weather and so lost, the loss was held only an average and not a total loss. Results of contract.

It was laid down in Usher v. Noble (s) that, in the case of an open policy, the invoice price of goods at the loading port, including premiums of insurance and commission, is the sum recoverable, and in the case of a ship its value at the outset of the voyage, plus outfit, stores and provisions, advance of wages, premium and charges of insurance (t).

Partial Loss.—The term partial loss needs no explanation: it is, however, proper to remark, that a loss which was once total, may by matter ex post facto become a partial one. Thus, if a ship be captured, the loss is total, and no doubt, if she continue in the power of the enemy up to the time of bringing the action, the insured may recover for a total loss. But if she escape, or be re-captured, so as to be still of value, that which was once a total loss becomes a partial one (u). So, when there is a policy on freight, and the ship is detained under an embargo, the loss is primâ facie total: yet, if the embargo be taken off, and she afterwards earn freight, it becomes partial (x).

With respect to the mode in which the sum to be paid by the underwriter on account of a partial loss is calculated, if the damage was suffered by the ship, and has been repaired by the owner, he will not be allowed the full costs of repairing, but (if the ship be not new) one-third is deducted in consideration of the benefit which he derives from new materials in lieu of old (y). If, however, the shipowner does not repair in case of a partial loss, and sells his ship during the continuance of the risk, the depreciation in value is the measure of the underwriter's liability (z).

If the goods are damaged, the mode adopted is, to ascertain the difference between the gross proceeds of the goods on their arrival at their destined port, and what would have been their gross proceeds had they not been injured. Then—as what would have been their gross proceeds if sound, is to their gross proceeds when damaged, so is their original value to a fourth quantity, which fourth quantity being subtracted from the original value, will give the sum to be paid by the underwriters (a). Thus, suppose the original value was 100*l.*; that the cargo, had it arrived safe at the end of its voyage, would have which will, therefore, amount to 75*l.*; subtracting 75*l.* from 100*l.*, the original value, we obtain 25*l.* the estimated loss, which must be made good by the underwriter. The reason for adopting the original value as the basis of this calculation is, that the insurance is a contract of indemnity, and the assured ought not to be allowed to make a profit by it, which he would do, if he were to receive any more than he originally paid.

The mode of ascertaining the original value of the goods in the case of an open policy is, to take the invoice price at the loading port, and add to that all expenses till put on board, together with the premium of insurance and commission (b); these being both charges to which the insured has actually been put on account of the goods, in order to send them on the voyage. Whether a payment on the shipment of the goods can be added to their value, is a question as yet undecided (c).

When the policy is a valued one, the parties have themselves agreed on the original value of the goods, and the standard is therefore adopted which they have fixed in the policy (d).

If the policy be on freight, and open, which is uncommon, the usage is to calculate the loss upon the gross, not on the net, value (e). If, as is usual, the policy be valued, and there be a partial loss of freight, the underwriter pays upon the proportion of value in the policy which the part of the cargo for which freight would have been payable had the voyage terminated successfully bears to the full cargo (f).

Should the policy be a continuing policy "as interest may appear," the assured, in the event of a partial loss, will recover the proportion of the loss to the total amount assured; e.g., if the policy be for 12,000*l.* on barges, only 3,000*l.* to be covered in any one barge, and goods to the value of 1,700*l.* be lost, the assurer will recover the proportion of the loss which 12,000*l.* bears to the value of goods afloat (g).

Generally speaking, where property, which has been partially deteriorated, is afterwards totally lost to the insured, and the previous deterioration thus becomes a matter of perfect indifference to his interest, he cannot make it the ground of a claim upon the underwriter, for of what consequence is the intermediate condition of the thing, if he be never to receive it again? But there may be cases in which, though a prior damage be followed by a total loss, the assured may, nevertheless, have rights or claims in respect of that prior loss, which may not be extinguished by the subsequent total loss (h). Actual disbursements for repairs in fact made in consequence of injuries by perils of the seas, previous to the happening of the total loss, are of this description; unless, indeed, they are more properly to be considered as covered by that authority, with which the assured, "their factors, servants, and assigns" (i), are usually invested by the policy, of "suing, labouring, and travailing, &c., for, in, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the property insured," in which case the amount of such disbursements might more properly be recovered as money paid for the underwriter, under the direction and allowance of this provision of the policy, than as a substantive average loss, to be added cumulatively to the amount of the total loss which is afterwards incurred (k). For such disbursements, if incurred to prevent loss insured against, the underwriter is liable over and above the amount of his subscription (l). Salvage expenses and

Section VI.—Proceedings after a Loss.

Adjustment.—When a loss has taken place, unless the underwriter can deny his liability to make it good, he usually proceeds to adjustment, which is the settling and ascertaining of the amount which the assured, after allowances and deductions are made, is entitled to receive under the policy, and fixing the proportion which each underwriter is liable to pay. Each underwriter pays only on the actual sum subscribed by him. Thus, if a policy for 1,000*l.* be subscribed by five underwriters for 200*l.* each, and the loss be one-fourth, viz., 250*l.*, each underwriter contributes 50*l.* only (n). When the amount to be paid by each underwriter is settled the policy is indorsed with a memorandum:—"Adjusted the loss on this policy at £ per cent." It is taken to the several underwriters, who affix their initials to the memorandum, and strike a pen through their subscriptions to the policy (o). The adjustment operates as an admission of all the facts necessary to constitute the underwriter responsible (p), but it is not conclusive upon him. Though it is incumbent on an underwriter, who has once admitted his liability by an adjustment, to make out a strong case, yet, until actual payment (q) of the money, he may avail himself of any defence which the law or facts will furnish (r). Proceedings after a loss.

If the underwriter contests his liability, he either relies upon the absence of some of the above-mentioned requisites to a contract of insurance, by alleging, for instance, that the insured is an alien enemy, or that there is no legal subject-matter of insurance, e.g., that the policy is a wager policy; or he insists that the risk never began, as, for instance, that the ship cleared out and sailed on a voyage different from that insured; or that he has been discharged by a breach of warranty; e.g., by a deviation; or he contends that the policy is vitiated by fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment on the part of the insured. All these grounds of defence have been already treated of; except the last, on which we will now say a few words.

It is essential that in all contracts of insurance the strictest good faith should be observed. For fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment of any material circumstance avoids the whole contract. Thus, if the underwriter assures a ship as on her voyage, which he privately knows to be arrived, the policy is void, and the assured may bring an action against him to recover back the premium (s). So, if the assured or his agent (t) misrepresent or conceal any material fact relating to the property insured, the policy is void, and the insurer not liable (u). When this takes place, the policy is vacated ab initio, and the underwriters may use it as a defence, though the loss have arisen from a cause wholly unconnected with the circumstance misrepresented or concealed (x).

A misrepresentation of a material fact vitiates the policy, whether the party assert a thing he knows to be false or does not know to be true (y) or honestly under a mistake (z). A material misrepresentation, though honestly made, will void the policy (a). Nor need the loss be in any way connected with the misrepresentation to have this effect (b). The misrepresentation will be of a material fact, if it consist of an assertion that the ship was safe on a particular day, will sail at a particular time (c), or will sail in company, and carry a certain force (d). A misrepresentation made to the first underwriter in a material point is considered as a misrepresentation to every one of the underwriters, for they are all supposed to follow the first (e). But a misrepresentation made to any underwriter other than the first is not to be considered as made to subsequent underwriters (f); and the rule concerning the effect of a misrepresentation to the first is founded, it is said, more upon precedent than reason (g), and must be received with great qualification (h).

If a representation be substantially true, that is sufficient, and in this respect it differs from a warranty, which must be literally complied with. Thus, where it was represented that the ship would carry twelve guns and twenty men, and she really carried nine guns and six swivels, and sixteen men and eleven boys, a force equal in amount to that represented, the policy was not avoided (i). Moreover, if the party who effects the policy do not make his assertion positively, but only as a matter of expectation and belief, it will be sufficient if he really believe it (k).

As to concealment, it is as fatal to the policy as misrepresentation; for insurance is a contract founded on speculation, and a knowledge of all the facts is necessary to enable the underwriter to calculate, and form a just estimate of the risk (l).

Nor is it an excuse that the concealment was attributable to the fraud or neglect of an agent (n), or that the account concealed was false (o), or in no way referred to the subsequent cause of loss (p), or was not concealed with a fraudulent design (q), nor does it matter whether it was known as a report or as a matter of positive intelligence (r). But the concealment which vitiates a policy must be of a fact material to a just estimate of the risk (s); not necessarily a fact which would actually affect the risk, if it might reasonably influence a prudent underwriter in determining, according to the principles on which underwriters in practice act, whether he should accept the risk at all, and if so, at what price (t). Therefore, the main question respecting concealment almost always is, whether the fact concealed be a material one in this sense (u). Of this description have been held to be,—intelligence that the vessel about to be insured, or a ship like her, has been lost, or which induced the owner to fear that she may be so (x); information respecting the time or manner of her sailing which is material to the probability of her safety, such, for instance, as would show her to be a missing ship, or out of time, or that she had encountered bad weather, or that another ship, which sailed after her, had arrived first (y); intelligence that she had been met with in a leaky state (z), or had from some other cause sustained damage before the commencement of the risk (a); or that she is in danger of an attack, as if a man were to insure a ship, knowing that enemies were lying in wait for her (b); the circumstance that in the case of a policy on goods, which included risk on lighters, the lightermen were released by the assuree from liability as common carriers (c); the fact that the ship or goods are overvalued (d), or that the assured had, under a series of open policies, systematically undervalued the shipments, thereby concealing the fact that the earlier policies were more exhausted than appeared (e).

A merchant residing at Sydney shipped goods by the ship C. for England, and, by another ship that sailed after the ship C., wrote to an agent in England, desiring him, if he received that letter before the C. arrived, to wait for thirty days, in order to give every chance of her arrival, and then effect an insurance on the goods; the letter was received, and the agent, having waited more than thirty days, employed a broker to effect an insurance, and handed the letter to him: the broker told the underwriter when the C. sailed, and when the letter ordering the insurance was written, but he did not state when it was received, nor the order to wait thirty days after the receipt of it before effecting an insurance. The C. never arrived. In an action on the policy, no fraud was imputed to the plaintiff; but the jury, being of opinion that a material part of the letter had been concealed, found a verdict for the defendant. It was held that the uncommunicated part of the letter was material, and the policy consequently void (f).

The question of the materiality of the representation or concealment is, subject to the direction of the judge, exclusively for the jury (g). Whether the evidence of underwriters upon the question is admissible is not settled (h).

The rule respecting concealment is confined to matters which lie within the private knowledge of the insured. He need not mention what the underwriter knows (i), or ought to know (j), —scientia utrimque par pares facit contrahentes. He need not mention general topics of speculation,—such as the difficulty of the voyage, the nature of the season, the probability of lightning, hurricanes, and earthquakes, of danger from the ruptures of states, from war, and the various operations of war. Men argue differently from natural phenomena and political appearances,—they have different capacities, different degrees of knowledge, and different modes of thinking; but the means of information are open alike to all—each professes to act from his own skill and sagacity, and therefore neither need communicate to the other the result of his individual judgment (k). The insured need not communicate the usage of trade, for the underwriter is supposed to know it (l); nor a fact which the underwriter may learn by the exercise of proper diligence (m). A communication in general terms not calculated to convey the full truth to the insurer will not be sufficient. An omission to communicate material facts will not be excused on the ground that the facts are known to the insurer, if his knowledge of them is not so particular and full as that of the assured, who ought to put the insurer in the same position as himself (n).

Though a London underwriter may primâ facie be taken to know matters contained in the shipping list at Lloyd's, yet if the insured makes a misrepresentation which may induce him to neglect looking at the list, the policy is avoided; at all events, unless the insured be able to show that he really did acquire a knowledge of the truth before subscribing the policy (o). The insured is not bound to communicate matter which forms an ingredient in a warranty, such, for instance, as that of seaworthiness: thus, where the assured received a letter mentioning that the ship had been surveyed at Trinidad on account of her bad character—but the survey which accompanied the letter gave the ship a good character—the concealment of this did not vacate the policy; for the insured impliedly warranted the ship to be seaworthy, and it did not appear either that she was, or that he had reason to think that she was, otherwise (p). If, after the broker has been instructed to effect a policy, his principal receive further intelligence, but the policy is effected before the principal can communicate it to the broker, the policy is valid, if the principal and broker appear to have acted with due diligence (q). And so, after the initialing of the slip, and before the execution of the policy, if the assured receive such intelligence, even although it be subject to ratification by the assured, for, according to the usage of underwriters, the initialed slip is binding in honour and good faith (r). "The time between the slip and the policy is not to be counted, and the latter relates back to the former" (s).

In every case, the question, whether the non-communication of a fact vacates the policy, depends, as has before been said, upon the further question, whether that fact was a material one (t). Thus, in some cases, the time of the ship's sailing has been held immaterial (u). Nor need the insured state to the underwriter general circumstances connected with the history and capabilities of the ship, e.g., her age, where she was built, what was her construction, whether clinker-built or not, whether copper-bottomed, when, how, and where repaired, &c. Circumstances of this nature would no doubt have weight in guiding the judgment of the underwriter; but it is not essential to the fairness of the contract that the insured should, in the first instance, disclose them—it is sufficient if he answer truly when it is demanded of him (w).

The assured will be affected by the knowledge of his agent with respect to the condition of the vessel.

"If an agent, whose duty it is, in the ordinary course of business, to communicate information to his principal as to the state of a ship and cargo, omits to discharge such duty, and the owner, in the absence of information as to any fact material to be communicated to the underwriter, effects an insurance, such insurance will be void on the ground of concealment or misrepresentation. The insurer is entitled to assume, as the basis of the contract between him and the assured, that the latter will communicate to him every material fact of which the assured has, or, in the ordinary course of business, ought to have, knowledge" (x).

In that case, the plaintiff's agent, a resident at Smyrna for buying goods for the plaintiff, and shipping them to him at Liverpool, became aware, on the 24th January, that a ship on board of which he had shipped a cargo for the plaintiff had been wrecked and the cargo lost on the 23rd. The agent wrote informing the plaintiff of the loss on the 26th January, the next post day. He might have telegraphed, but he purposely refrained from doing so. It was held that it was the duty of the agent to have telegraphed, and that a policy "lost or not lost," effected by the plaintiff before receiving the letter of the 26th, and without knowledge of the loss, was void (y). An agent who while negotiating an insurance receives information of a material fact, cannot, by handing the matter over to his principals to continue the negotiations, release them from the duty of communicating the information (z). Proceedings after a loss.

The assured is not affected by the knowledge of every agent, but only where the agent is such that, in respect of the particular matter in question, he represents the principal (a). For example, in Blackburn, Low & Co. v. Vigors (b), the plaintiff had instructed a broker to effect for him a re-insurance upon an overdue ship. While acting on behalf of the plaintiff the broker received information of a material fact, tending to show that the ship was lost. He did not communicate it to the plaintiff, and did not effect the re-insurance. Afterwards, the plaintiff effected, through another broker, a policy of re-insurance "lost or not lost" upon the ship with the defendant. The ship had been lost before the plaintiff tried to re-insure her through the first broker. Neither the plaintiff nor the second broker, who actually effected the re-insurance, had any knowledge of the material fact known to the first broker. It was held in the House of Lords, that the policy was not affected by the non-disclosure of the information acquired by the first broker; for he was not the general agent of the plaintiff, but only an agent for the purpose of a particular contract, and this agency had ceased at the time the policy was entered into. "There was no material fact known to any agent which was not disclosed at the point of time at which the contract was made; there was no one possessed of knowledge whose duty it was to communicate such knowledge" (c).

Besides the general defences to a policy of marine insurance treated of in the preceding pages, there may, of course, be other defences arising out of the terms of the policy; e.g., in the case of mutual insurance companies, it is common to stipulate that no member whose share is mortgaged, and no mortgagee or assignee, unless he shall have paid or undertaken to pay all sums due by such member to the association, shall have any claim in virtue of the policy. This will be regarded as a condition precedent (y).

Return of Premium.—If the underwriter should succeed in establishing a defence against his liability upon the policy, a question immediately arises, whether the insured be entitled to a return of premium; and, if so, whether to a return of all or part. On this subject the parties sometimes enter into an agreement, and if they do, the terms of that must, of course, be observed (z), and will regulate the amount of the sum to be returned and the circumstances under which it is returnable (a).

If there be no express stipulation, the question of return or no return is regulated by two main principles: First, where the risk has not been run, the premium shall be returned; for the underwriter receives it for running the risk, and, if he do not run the risk, he ought not to retain it (b). Thus, if the policy were on goods, and no goods are put on board the ship, the premium must be returned (c). And on this ground rests the return of premium for short interest, which occurs when part only of the goods embraced by the policy is put on board, in which case a portion of the premium corresponding to the deficiency must be returned (d).

In Fisk v. Masterman (e), insurances had been effected on the 12th of April to the amount of 14,150*l.*, and on the 13th to the amount of 22,300*l.* It turned out that the whole value was 30,333*l.* 10*s.*, so that there was 6,116*l.* 10*s.* short interest. The Court held, that there must be a return by the underwriters on the 13th, the amount of over-insurance to be ascertained by taking all the policies into account, but no return to be made by the underwriters on the 12th. Proceedings after a loss.

So, where profits are the subject of insurance there may be a return of premium for short profits (f). But, if it be a valued policy, and all the goods intended were put on board, the insured will not be entitled to a return on the ground that they were not of the value specified (g).

The policy may attach though at the time it was entered into there could not, in fact, be a loss, and though the question of loss or no loss was then determined. Thus, in Bradford v. Symondson (h), the defendant, who had insured a cargo by a vessel "lost or not lost" for a certain voyage, subsequently re-insured the same cargo with the plaintiff for the same risk. Before the re-insurance was effected the vessel had arrived safely—a fact not known to the plaintiff or defendant at the time of the re-insurance. It was contended that the policy had not attached, and consequently that the plaintiff was not entitled to the premium on the re-insurance. The Court of Appeal held otherwise. "The fallacy in the defendant's argument," said Bramwell, L. J., "arises from the double meaning of the word 'risk.' That means both the voyage commenced with necessary conditions to make the underwriters liable, and, also, the chance of loss during its performance. In the latter sense, there was no risk at the time of re-insurance. But that is not the sense in which the word is used by the authorities. It is used in the first sense I have mentioned." Secondly, when the risk embraced by the policy is entire, and has once commenced, there can be no return of the premium, or of any part of it (i); thus, even if the insurance be for twelve months at a certain rate per month, and the risk ceases at the end of two months, there can be no apportionment or return of premium (k); for, as the whole risk attached, the underwriter would have been obliged to settle for a total loss had such a one taken place within the two months, and the specification of a certain sum per month is only a mode of computing the gross amount of premium. Again, if a ship insured from A. to B. sail in an unseaworthy condition, the underwriter's risk never commences (l): and the premium, as we have seen, must be returned. But if a vessel be insured at and from A. to B., and sail in an unseaworthy condition, no portion of the premium is returnable; for the risk attached, while she remained at A., before she sailed; and if she had been lost while there, a total loss would have been payable (m). So, again, if the ship deviate, the underwriter is discharged; yet, inasmuch as the risk once attached, and as he might have been subjected to a total loss had she perished before she reached the point of deviation, no portion of the premium is returnable (n).

We have seen that there can be no return of premium where the risk is entire and has once commenced. But if the insurance be, in effect, on two or more voyages, and one or more have not commenced, there shall be an apportionment and return of premium in respect of those voyages that have not commenced; for, in such a case, the risk is not entire, nor is the underwriter for a single moment liable to make good any loss incurred during the latter voyages (o). The usual mode of showing that the risk is to be considered as thus divided is by proving an usage of trade to that effect, of which usage the underwriter must, of course, be presumed cognizant (p). Thus, where the insurance was from London to Halifax, warranted to depart with convoy from Portsmouth, the ship not having departed with convoy from Portsmouth, and the jury having found a usage to return part of the premium in such a case; the Court thought that the contract was for an insurance from London to Halifax; which contract, in case of the ship's not departing from Portsmouth with convoy, was to be reduced to an insurance from London to Portsmouth; that, as she had not departed from Portsmouth with convoy, the contract had been so reduced, and, consequently, that there must be a part-return of the premium for the risk never incurred, viz., that from Portsmouth to Halifax (q). Proceedings after a loss.

It remains to be observed, that, even where the risk never commenced, yet if the assured or his agent have been guilty of fraud, for instance, if he knew that the ship was lost when he insured her, there can be no return of premium (r). The same rule holds, if the insurance be illegal, and the voyage have been performed, unless the parties could not have known of the illegality (s), or believed that the risk would be legal, and took the usual effective steps to make it so (t), for in pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis (u). But this maxim does not apply where the return of premium is claimed before the voyage has commenced; for then, the contract being still executory, there is a locus pœnitentiæ, and either party has a right to rescind it, since, by doing so, he prevents the commission of that which the law forbids (x). However, the party seeking to rescind must formally renounce the contract, and give notice to the underwriter that he has done so, before he can bring an action to recover back the premium (y).

If a policy has been regularly executed (z), the remedy is by an action, which, as we have already seen, may be brought in the name of the assignee of the policy (a), or by the broker who effected the policy (b). The policy may, however, be so worded as to render a reference the only mode of ascertaining the amount due (c), if it be disputed, and sometimes it imposes qualifications on the liability of the insurers (d). The policy being a contract of indemnity, a claim upon it cannot, in general, be answered by, nor form the subject of, a set-off (e).

When several actions are brought on a policy against several underwriters, the Court will make a rule for staying the proceedings in all the actions except one, on the defendants undertaking to be bound by the verdict in that action, and consenting to other reasonable terms (f). But though all the defendants are bound to abide by the verdict in that single action, the plaintiff is not so (g); however, if he proceeded in a second action without the leave of the Court, he will not be allowed the benefit of the terms imposed on the defendants by the consolidation rule. And if he have effected several insurances declaring the same value in each, he is bound for that sum, and cannot receive beyond that extent (h). The sum recovered under one policy goes in reduction of that recoverable under another. Thus, where he declares different values, viz., 8,000*l.* on one policy, and 4,000*l.* on another, and recover 6,000*l.* under the former, he cannot in a subsequent action recover under the second (i).

CHAPTER V.

INSURANCE UPON LIVES.

Insurance upon lives.

INSURANCE upon a life is a contract by which the insurer, in consideration of a certain premium, either in a gross sum, or by annual payments, undertakes to pay to the person for whose benefit the insurance is made, a certain sum of money or annuity on the death of the person whose life is insured (a). If the insurance be for the whole life, he undertakes to make the payment whenever the death happens; if otherwise, he undertakes to make it in case the death should happen within a certain period, for which period the insurance is said to be made.

As an unlimited power of effecting insurances of this description would give rise to a species of gambling, it is enacted by stat. 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, as follows:—

"Sect. 1. No insurance shall be made by any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, on the life or lives of any person or persons, or on any other event or events whatsoever (b), wherein the person or persons for whose use, benefit, or on whose account such policy or policies shall be made, shall have no interest, or by way of gaming or wagering; and every assurance, made contrary to the true intent and meaning hereof, shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

"Sect. 2. It shall not be lawful to make any policy or policies on the life or lives of any person or persons, or other event or events, without inserting in such policy or policies the person* or persons

(b) Perhaps it might not be very easy to say to what description of wagers, particularly if written, this statute is inapplicable. See Paterson v. Powell, 9 Bing. 320; Roebuck v. Hamerton, Cowp. 737; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. But see Good v. Elliott, 3 T. R. 693, and Morgan v. Pebrer, 3 Bing. N. name or names interested therein, or for whose use, benefit, or on whose account such policy is so made or underwrote (c).

"Sect. 3. In all cases where the insured hath interest in such life or lives, event or events, no greater sum shall be recovered or received from the insurer or insurers than the amount or value of the interest of the insured in such life or lives, or other event or events" (d).

The Act does not void generally contracts made contrary thereto, but only as between the insurers and the insured. It is a defence to the insurers only, if they choose to avail themselves of it (e). A father effected, for his own benefit, an insurance in the name and on the life of his son, in which he had no insurable interest, and the insurers on the death of the son paid the father the amount insured; it was held that the father was entitled to retain the amount as against the son's estate notwithstanding the statute (f).

Marine insurances are exempted from the operation of this Act (g).

The Act does not prohibit individuals from effecting insurances upon their own lives, provided that be done bonâ fide; but it seems that a man would not be allowed to evade the statute by procuring another, in whose life he had no interest, to insure it with his money and for his benefit, though ostensibly for the advantage of the party insuring (h).

The period to which the 3rd section of the statute refers, is that of effecting the policy, and therefore the assured is entitled to recover, to the extent of the limit mentioned in the policy, the value of his interest at that time, notwithstanding its subsequent diminution or even extinction (i). The sum, too, he may recover is not restricted to the value of his interest at the time of effecting the policy, but may include any benefit coming to the assured upon the determination of the event (k).

When a life policy has been assigned, it is not necessary that the assignee should have any interest or have paid any consideration for the assignment; for he stands upon the rights of the party who effected the insurance, and stat. 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, only applies to the original parties, not to assignees (l).

A trustee may insure in respect of the interest of which he is trustee (m), and a creditor has an insurable interest in the life of his debtor (n), provided that the debt be not an illegal one (o). An employer has an insurable interest in the life of a servant, and vice versâ (p). Speaking generally, any one who has a pecuniary claim against another or a legal right to support (q) has an insurable interest in the life of the latter.

In the well-known case of Godsall v. Boldero (r), the Court of Queen's Bench held, by analogy to marine and fire policies, that, insurance being a contract of indemnity, the insured could found no claim upon his policy, if the debt or other interest in respect of which he made it were satisfied aliunde. But in Dalby v. The India and London Life Assurance Company (s), the Court of Exchequer Chamber overruled this doctrine, and decided that a life policy, both in form and effect, is an absolute contract to pay a certain sum in the case of death.

(l) Ashley v. Ashley, 3 Sim. 149. There are, indeed, some cases in which the insurers,—as the condition upon which they allow an assignee some advantage he would not otherwise have had,—impose on him the necessity of proving that he is an assignee for value; as, for instance, where they allow a policy, which would as against the insured be avoided by his suicide, to be good in favour of an assignee for value to the extent of his interest. See Cook v. Black, 1 Hare, 390.

Insurance upon lives.

Lord Tenterden, in Halford v. Kymer (s), expressed a strong opinion, that the word "interest," in the statute above cited, means a pecuniary interest; and in the same case it was held, that a father had not such an interest in his son's life as would entitle him to insure it (t). Lord Kenyon was of opinion that a wife, making an assurance on her husband's life, need not prove that she was interested therein, for that it must be presumed (u). It is open to doubt whether such a presumption exists; in each case the question appears to be one of fact (x).

By the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (y), a married woman may insure her own or her husband's life for her separate use, and a policy effected by a man on his own life and expressed to be for the benefit of his wife or children, or by a woman on her life and expressed to be for the benefit of her husband or children, shall create a trust in favour of the objects therein named (z).

At common law the contract need not be in writing (a). But by the Stamp Act the contract or policy must be in writing (b).

Before the policy is effected, it is usual for the person whose life is insured to subscribe a declaration or answer questions concerning his age, health, and other circumstances (c). This declaration is recited and incorporated by reference in the policy (d), at the end of which a proviso is ordinarily inserted, declaring the policy to be void in case the insured should die upon the seas, or go beyond the limits of Europe without leave obtained (e), commit suicide (f), or die by the hands of justice (g), or if the age of the assured exceed —— years, or he be afflicted with any disease which tends to the shortening of life, or in case the declaration should contain any averment which is not true. These are the usual conditions, but they are sometimes varied to suit the objects of different insurers. In construing them the principle is that good faith is required. "I am not prepared," said Jessel, M. R., in London Assurance v. Mansel (h), "to lay down the law as making any difference in substance between one contract of assurance and another. Whether it is life, or fire, or marine assurance, I take it good faith is required in all cases." It has been held that the condition which avoids the policy in case any untrue averment be contained in the declaration is to be taken literally; and that, where it is inserted, the insurance becomes void if any statement be in fact untrue, although the party making it is not apprised of its untruth (i). The question for the Court is, not whether the representations are material, but whether they are true (k). And so the policy will be void, if the person whose life is insured have had any of the complaints which the declaration states he has not had, although the attack may have been of so mitigated a character as could not have a tendency to shorten life (l). Where the assured, in answer to the question "Are you temperate in your habits?" answered "Yes," and it was proved that he was intemperate, it was held that the policy was void (m). A condition that the person is in good health is understood to mean that he is in reasonably good health, not that he is free from the seeds of disorder. Such a condition has been held to be complied with, though the party whose life was insured was occasionally troubled with spasms, cramps, and violent fits of the gout (n). Nor is it to be concluded that a disease is one tending to shorten life within the meaning of the policy from the single fact that the party afterwards dies of it, if it be not a disorder necessarily having that tendency (o). Provisions are usually inserted in policies effected by the insured on their own lives respecting death by duelling or the sentence of the law. But they are in fact superfluous, for the policy would be unavailable to the representatives of the insured in case of such a death, even if they were not inserted; and if a man insuring his own life were to introduce a contrary provision, it would be void as being against public policy (p).

The condition respecting death by suicide, or, as it is sometimes expressed, "by his own hands," would likewise be superfluous, if its meaning were confined to acts of felonious self-destruction. But in the case of Borradaile v. Hunter (q), which arose on a policy containing a proviso in the latter form, the jury having found that the assured "voluntarily threw himself from the bridge into the water, with the intention of destroying life; but that, at the time of committing the act, he was not capable of judging between right and wrong," three judges of the Court of Common Pleas held the policy to have been avoided. Tindal, C. J., however, expressed his opinion, that, regarding the context, the condition was limited to cases of felonious suicide. He considered it quite clear that such would have been its operation, if the words used had been "shall die by suicide;" and, in this construction, Erskine, J., seems to have concurred. In the case of Schwabe v. Clift (s), which arose upon a policy containing the words "commit suicide," Cresswell, J., at Nisi Prius, told the jury that, in his opinion, "it must appear that the deceased was a responsible moral agent at the time of his death, in order to make the act committed by him amount to suicide;" and, if they thought he could not "at the time distinguish and understand the nature and quality of the act he was doing," they should find a verdict for the plaintiff, which they did. Upon a bill of exceptions to this ruling, the majority of the judges in the Exchequer Chamber held (t), that these words included all cases of voluntary self-destruction: and that if the deceased voluntarily killed himself, it was immaterial whether he was at the time sane or not. In the absence of an express provision in the policy, that in the event of the insured dying by his own hands the policy shall become void, the policy is not avoided, if the insured while in a state of temporary insanity takes his own life (u).

An exception is generally engrafted upon this condition, that the policy shall remain in force to the extent of any bonâ fide interest a third person may acquire in it. This is valid, and in general it is not necessary that the policy should have been assigned, but a deposit or lien will suffice (x).

Some policies contain a provision that the company shall be answerable only for death or injuries caused by "external" causes; and questions similar to those discussed with reference to marine insurance arise as to whether a death or an accident is covered by the policy. The tendency is, as in construing contracts of marine insurance, to look to the proximate cause. In Reynolds v. Accidental Insurance Co. (y), the deceased had been drowned in a pool a foot deep, owing to a fit or some other cause; the executors of the insured were held entitled to recover under a policy containing a proviso, that "no claim should be payable in respect of death by accident, unless the same should be occasioned by some external or material cause operating on the insured person."

The payment of the agreed premium in the stipulated manner is almost an invariable condition (z), though such a provision will not be implied (a). If this provision be broken, a subsequent receipt of the premium by the insurance company's agent will not set up the policy, the agent not being authorized to bind the company by a fresh agreement to insure (b); though a payment to an agent having such authority will be evidence of such an agreement. Nor will receipt of premium by the company after the death of the assured, unless the company was aware of the fact, be construed as a waiver (c). Once the risk

(z) A certain number of days (usually fifteen) after the premium becomes due, called days of grace, are frequently allowed for the payment by the conditions. These should never be depended upon, as generally they only provide for payment by the assured, and render it optional with the company whether they will receive the premium, so that if the life drops in the interval, the policy will be void: Tarleton v. Staniforth, 5 T. has attached, no matter for how short a period, there shall be no return of the premium (d).

If there be no warranty or condition on the part of the insured, the insurer is subject to all risks, unless he (e) can show a fraudulent concealment or misrepresentation (f), or a non-communication of material facts known to the assured (g), either of which will avoid the policy. It is the duty of the insured to disclose all material facts within his knowledge; and, if the fact suppressed be material, it signifies not whether the party did or did not believe it to be so, its materiality being a question of fact (h). An insurance company had agreed to insure a life at a specified premium, on the terms that no insurance should take place till the premium was paid; before the tender of the premium there was a material alteration in the risk; in these circumstances it was held that there was no contract binding the company to grant a policy (i). A verbal misrepresentation vitiates the policy, although it be expressly stipulated by its terms that it shall be void on untrue answers being given to certain written inquiries (k). It has been held, that an action will lie to have a fraudulent policy delivered up, but that the equity is better, if it be brought during the continuance of the life assured (l). But, it seems, that no such action would lie on the ground of there being no insurable interest (m).

Where one person insures the life of another, the party whose life is insured, if applied to for information, is not, in giving it, impliedly the agent of the party insuring: the latter, therefore, is not bound by his statements, and, in the absence of any condition to that effect (m), or fraud on his own part, will not suffer should they be false (n). "We quite agree with the rule that the fraud of the agent who makes the contract is the fraud of the principal; but we cannot regard the fraudulent parties in the present case as the parties intrusted to make the contract or to represent the plaintiffs in so doing" (o).

"Fraud," says Bramwell, B., in delivering judgment in Wheelton v. Hardisty (p), in the Exchequer Chamber, "on the part of the person effecting the insurance, or of his agent, of course, avoids the policy; but I cannot see how the mere fraud of some third party can have that effect, unless there be an express condition between the contracting parties to that effect" (q).

Concealment, therefore, by the person whose life is insured, of a mortal disease known to himself will not avoid the policy, if the existence of such disease were unknown to the assured (r).

It seems, too, that though the person assuring his own life may have been afflicted with a disease tending to shorten life, still if that disease were of such a nature, that he himself could not be conscious of what happened to him while suffering under it (as in some cases of mental derangement) (s), his non-communication thereof would not vitiate the policy. So, if he declare that he is not aware of his having any disorder tending to shorten his life, in order to defeat the policy it must be shown, not only that he had such a disorder, but that he was aware of its tendency (t).

Non-fulfilment of the conditions on which a policy is granted may, however, be waived by the insurers if they do any act amounting to an affirmance of the contract, e.g., if they receive premiums, after knowledge of the breach of the condition (u).

A policy upon a life could not, until recently, have been assigned at law, but now this may be done, either by indorsement or by a separate instrument (x); and any person entitled by assignment (y) or derivative title who has acquired a right to receive and give a discharge for the sum assured, may sue upon it in his own name (z). No assignment, however, will confer on the assignee this right of suit, until a written notice of the date and purport of it has been given to the assurance company; and priority in giving this notice will regulate the priority of the claim of the person giving it under his assignment (a). The statute does not alter the rights of parties. It only enables the insured to sue in his own name.

The assignee of a policy takes it subject to all defects in the title or interest of the assignor (b). On the other hand, he succeeds to all his rights. The assignee need not have any interest in the life insured or have paid any consideration (c). It seems, however, that the provisions of 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, cannot be evaded by effecting a policy in the name of the person whose life is insured, but in reality for the benefit and with the money of another, who has no interest in the life (d).

CHAPTER VI.

INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.

By this contract, the insurer, in consideration of a certain premium paid, either in gross or at stated intervals, undertakes to indemnify the assured against damage to his property by fire, during a limited period of time, usually a year (a). The contract is usually in the form of a policy; though it may be, and often is, a slip, initialled by the underwriters (b).

It is necessary that the assured should have an interest in the property protected, and, in case of loss, he will only be able to recover to the extent of that interest; for fire insurance, like marine insurance, is a contract of indemnity (c). "Only those can recover who have an insurable interest, and they can recover only to the extent to which that insurable interest is damaged by the loss" (d).

The insurer, upon payment of the amount insured, is entitled to be subrogated to all the rights of the assured (e). "As between the underwriter and the assured, the underwriter is (a) A great variety of forms are adopted by the different insurance offices in framing their fire policies. Some are, indeed, so worded, that it is very difficult to determine who are the parties to be sued by the insured in case of loss, or even whether any action whatever be maintainable upon the policy. See Andrews v. Ellison, 6 Moore (C. P.) 199; Alchorne v. Saville, Id. 202, note; Gurney v. Rawlins, 2 M. & W. 87; Hallett v. Dowdall, 18 Q. B. 2; Elliott v. The R. E. A. Co., L. entitled to the advantage of every right of the assured, whether such right consists in contract, fulfilled or unfulfilled, or in remedy for tort capable of being insisted on, or already insisted on, or in any other right, whether by way of condition or otherwise, legal or equitable, which can be or has been exercised, or has accrued, and whether such right could or could not be enforced by the insurer in the name of the assured, by the exercise or acquiring of which right or condition the loss against which the assured is insured, can be or has been diminished" (f). If, for instance, the assurer brings an action and recovers judgment against those who have caused the injury, he will be a trustee for the insurer for the amount so recovered; and he may not compromise the action otherwise than bonâ fide (g).

Where a vendor had contracted with a purchaser for the sale for a specified price of a house insured by the vendor, the contract containing no reference to the insurance, and afterwards, before completion of the purchase, the house was burned, and the amount of the insurance paid to the vendor, the insurers were, after the completion of the purchase, and payment of the price to the vendor, held entitled to recover from him a sum equal to the insurance money previously paid (h).

If, after the insurer has paid the amount of the loss, the assured receives otherwise compensation for the loss, the insurer is entitled to recover from the assured any sum received in excess of the loss actually sustained (i).

It has, indeed, been said that the doctrine of abandonment, which, we have seen, applies to marine insurances, does not apply to insurances of houses, &c. against fire. This, it was pointed out in Castellain v. Preston (k), arises not from any difference in principle, but from the difference in the subject-matter of the two contracts, there being no such thing as a constructive total loss of a house, buildings, &c.

(f) Brett, L. J., in Castellain v. Preston, 11 Q. B. D. 380, at p. 388, distinguishing Burnand v. Rodocanachi, 7 App. Cas. 333.

(k) Castellain v. Preston, supra.

Insurance against fire.

The interest of each of different persons having different and distinct interests in the same house may be insured. Thus, a mortgagor and mortgagee of property may both insure the same property, or a warehouseman and the owner of the goods warehoused may both insure the goods (e).

Insurance being a contract of indemnity, an insurer who has only a limited interest, e.g., a tenant of the property insured, cannot, in case of loss, obtain more than the full value of his interest; if, however, he has insured for the full value of the property, as he may do in certain cases, he holds the balance for the parties interested. The law upon this point is thus stated by Bowen, L. J., in Castellain v. Preston (f):—

"A person with a limited interest may insure either for himself and to cover his own interest only, or he may insure so as to cover not merely his own limited interest, but the interest of all others who are interested in the property. It is a question of fact what is his intention when he obtains the policy. But he can only hold for so much as he has intended to insure. Let us take a few of the cases which are most commonly known in commerce of the persons who insure. There are persons who have a limited interest, who insure for the total value of the subject-matter. There is the case, which is, I suppose, the most common, of carriers and wharfingers and commercial agents, who have an interest in the adventure (g). It is well known what their rights are. Then let us turn to the case of a mortgagee. If he has the legal ownership, he is entitled to insure for the whole value; but even supposing he is not entitled to the legal ownership, he is entitled to insure primâ facie for all. If he intends to cover only his mortgage, and is only insuring his own interest, he can only, in the event of a loss, hold the amount to which he has been damnified. If he has intended to cover other persons beside himself, he can hold the surplus for those whom he has intended to cover. But one thing he cannot do, that is, having intended only to cover himself, and being a person whose interest is only limited, he cannot hold anything beyond the amount of the loss caused to his own particular interest."

Insurance against fire.

A misrepresentation or concealment of material facts is as fatal to this as to other contracts of insurance. To use the words of Bayley, J. (h),

"In all cases of insurance, whether on ships, houses, or lives, the underwriter should be informed of every material circumstance within the knowledge of the assured, and the proper question is, whether any particular circumstance was in fact material, and not whether the party believed it to be so" (i).

It is necessary to be extremely accurate in describing the nature of the property intended to be insured, in order that it may not fall without the scope of the policy. For where a policy was effected on "Stock in trade, household furniture, linen, wearing apparel and plate," the person insured not being a linen-draper, this was held not to protect linen subsequently purchased on speculation, the word linen in the policy being taken to mean household linen, or linen used by way of apparel (k). The insurance of an innkeeper's "interest in the inn and offices" does not cover the loss of profits sustained between the destruction of the inn by fire and its restoration. Such profits are, indeed, insurable, but they must be insured quâ profits (l). If a building be described as of one class instead of another, when a larger premium would have been required for that other, the policy becomes completely void (m).

But, though the most appropriate phrase be not employed, yet, if the description of the property be substantially correct, and a more accurate statement would not have varied the premium, the error is not material (n). And where goods were described as in the dwelling-house of the insured, and it turned out that the insured had but one room as a lodger, in which the goods were, it was held, that they were correctly described within a condition, that "the houses, buildings and other places where goods are deposited and kept, shall be truly and accurately described"; such a condition relating to the construction of the house, not to the interest of the parties in it (o). And when the policy was effected on premises "where no fire is kept and no hazardous goods deposited," these words were held to mean habitually kept and habitually deposited, so that the policy was not vitiated by bringing a tar-barrel and lighting a fire in order to effect repairs, in consequence of which the loss occurred (p). In Pearson v. Commercial Union Assurance Co. (q), it was held that a fire policy on a ship in wet dock, with liberty to go into dry dock, did not cover loss sustained while the vessel was outside these limits for a collateral purpose. The risk being essentially local, the policy will not cover goods during transit unless it be expressly so provided (r).

Risks are commonly divided by the insurance offices into three classes; 1st, Common Insurances; 2ndly, Hazardous; 3rdly, Doubly Hazardous. There are, besides, a few cases of what is called Extraordinary Risks, e. g., those of sugar refineries; these are generally excluded from the table of premiums, and made subjects of special agreement. Cash, and securities for cash, are, it is believed, seldom insurable on any terms.

Every warranty or condition inserted in the policy, or incorporated into it by reference from the printed proposals (which are considered parcel of the contract), must be strictly and literally observed. For example, where it was stipulated in the proposals, that loss money should not be payable till the insured should have produced a certificate of character from the minister of the parish, it was held, that he could not recover, even though the minister should have wrongfully refused to grant such certificate; for that, if a man undertakes for the act of a stranger, he must see it done (s). Again, where a policy contained a condition requiring that, in case any steam-engine, stove, &c., or any other description of fire-heat should be introduced, notice thereof should be given, and that every such alteration should be allowed by indorsement, and any further premium paid, otherwise no benefit to arise in case of loss; it was held that the introduction and mere temporary use of a steam-engine as an experiment, without notice, avoided the policy (t). A condition that notice should be given of any change in the business carried on upon the premises, was held not to render it necessary to give notice of a temporary and gratuitous permission given to a friend to dry some bark there (u). A description of the premises insured may amount to a warranty that the assured will not, during the term insured, voluntarily do anything to make the condition of the premises vary from the description (x). Unless contrary to some condition in the policy or warranty and in the absence of fraud, the circumstance that subsequently to effecting the policy a more hazardous trade has without notice to the insurers been carried on upon the premises will not avoid the policy (y).

The conditions generally require, that, in the event of a loss, an account of the particulars of it is to be rendered by the

"It has been argued," said Maule, J., "that independently of the express provisions of the policy, if hazardous articles or a hazardous trade were introduced upon the premises with the knowledge or assent of the assured, after the policy was effected, it would be thereby avoided. But I conceive the law to be otherwise; and that, in the absence of fraud, such an alteration would not vitiate the policy; and that the insurers must pay for any loss, notwithstanding such alteration, unless by some condition in the policy they have provided against it." See Shaw v. Robberds, supra. Mayall v. Mitford, 6 Ad. & E. 670; and Whitehead v. Price, 2 C. M. & R. 447, if rightly decided, appear to turn on the words of the particular policy. Both were cases in which motion was made after judgment.

assured. No action can be maintained (z) until this has been complied with.

The insurance being against fire, a loss by fire must of course happen, in order to give the insured a claim upon the policy. The word fire must be taken in its ordinary sense, and fire must be the proximate, not merely the remote, cause of the loss. Where the register of a sugar-house was kept shut by mistake, so that the sugar was overheated and spoiled, this was held not to be a loss by fire, but by mismanagement (a).

In Stanley v. Western Insurance Co. (b), where a policy against loss by fire exempted the insurers from liability for loss occasioned by explosion, it was held that the exemption was not limited to cases where the fire was originated by explosion, but included cases where the explosion occurred in the course of a fire, and exempted the insurers in respect both of the damage caused by the explosion itself, and of the damage done by the further fire caused by the explosion. Explosion by gas means ordinary coal gas (c). The policy usually narrows the liability of the insurer still further, by declaring that "no loss or damage by fire, happening by any invasion, foreign enemy, or any military and usurped power, will be made good by the insurers." The words usurped power are understood to refer to the power of rebels or invaders, not of a common mob. And, therefore, when a mob at Norwich burnt down the insured's malting-house, he was held entitled to recover (d); nor, formerly, would the fact that the insured had previously recovered from the insurer bar his action against the hundred, or against the party who had committed the injury, for he might sue as a trustee for the insurer (e).

In some instances its delivery within a specified time is a condition precedent to the right to recover: Roper v. Lendon, 1 E. & E. 825; and generally there is a provision, that any fraud in it shall disentitle the assured to recover anything: Weir v. *Northern Ins. Now, however, by the existing enactment with reference to compensation in case of loss by riot (f), it is provided that a person sustaining loss in case of riot shall, so far as he has been recouped by way of insurance, &c., receive no compensation, but the person paying the insurance, &c., shall be compensated as if he had sustained the loss. The introduction of the words civil commotion into the above exception will exempt the insurer from liability for the tumultuous act of rioters (g).

A loss by mere negligence, so that there be no fraud, is covered by the policy (h); though such negligence, if gross, may be evidence of fraud; and if the assured fraudulently prevents the employment of means to stop the fire, he may lose his remedy under the contract (i). Whether, in the absence of special provisions, the principle of general average applies to fire policies, does not seem to have been decided in this country.

Apparently the assured is bound to use reasonable efforts to save his goods; and he may recover, it is alleged, even in the absence of a provision to that effect, for the costs of such efforts (l).

Fire policies usually contain a proviso that the company may if they think fit, reinstate, replace or repair the property damaged or destroyed instead of paying the amount of the loss. If the company once elect to reinstate they cannot afterwards compel the assured to accept payment in lieu (m).

In order to deter evil-disposed persons from wilfully setting their own premises on fire for the purpose of obtaining the insurance money, the old Metropolitan Building Act, 14 Geo. 3, c. 78, s. 83 (n), enables the offices, at the request of any person interested in a building burnt down or damaged, or upon any suspicion of fraud, to cause the insurance money to be laid out in repairs, unless the party insured, within sixty days after his claim has been adjusted, give security that the money shall be so expended; or unless the money be at that time disposed of to the satisfaction of all parties. This section is not, as has been supposed, confined to the metropolis, but is of general and universal application to insurance moneys on "houses and buildings" (o). In consequence of this provision it has been held that a covenant to insure such premises runs with the land, and that an assignee of the reversion can maintain an action for breach of the covenant against a tenant, who had entered into the covenant with his assignor. As the landlord may, in consequence of the statute, insist on the insurance money being laid out upon the premises, the covenant is "a covenant to do a matter which concerns the land, and falls within the rule laid down in Spencer's Case" (p).

The contract of insurance does not pass to a purchaser of the land, unless it is expressly included in the contract of sale. "The contract," says Lord Justice Cotton, in Rayner v. Preston (q), "passes all things belonging to the vendors appurtenant to or necessarily connected with the use and enjoyment of the property mentioned in the contract, but not, in my opinion, collateral contracts; and such, in my opinion, at least, independently of the Act 14 Geo. 3, c. 78, the policy of insurance is." Nor does the statute give the purchaser a right to the money; at most it entitles him to require that the money shall be applied in rebuilding (r). The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (s), enacts that, in the absence of agreement, the mortgagee may require the mortgagor to apply money paid to the mortgagor under an insurance to making good the loss or damage in respect of which the money is paid.

The principle of contribution applies to fire as to marine insurances. If the same person in respect of the same right insures with several different insurers, they, in case of loss, contribute equally towards the loss (t). The principle does not apply where different persons insure in respect of different rights. B. & Co., wharfingers, effected wharfingers' policies on grain in their warehouses for which they were responsible; and R. & Co., the owners of the grain, effected merchants' policies upon the same grain; the grain having been destroyed by fire, and B. & Co. having been paid in full by the insurers, it was held that the insurers on the merchants' policies were not liable to contribute to the loss (u).

Now, since the Judicature Act, 1873 (x), if there has been an absolute assignment in writing of a policy of fire insurance, of which express notice in writing has been given to the insurer, the assignee, to the extent of his interest, may in his own name recover from the insurer in case of loss.

An insurer may, as in the case of marine insurance, protect himself, in whole or in part, by a re-insurance (y).

CHAPTER VII.

BOTTOMRY AND RESPONDENTIA.

Bottomry and Respondentia.

BOTTOMRY is an agreement entered into by the owner of a ship, or his agent, whereby, in consideration of a sum of money advanced for the use of the ship, the borrower undertakes to repay the same, with interest, if the ship terminate her voyage successfully, and binds or hypothecates the ship for the performance of his contract. The contract, which must be in writing (a), by which this hypothecation is effected is sometimes in the shape of a deed poll, and is then called a bottomry bill; sometimes in that of a bond (b). Whatever be its form, the contract should be clearly set out in it (a). The essence of the contract is that there should be a maritime risk to be ascertained from the writing (c). Therefore, bills of exchange drawn by the master on the owner, though accompanied with a verbal engagement that the ship should be liable, cannot be considered instruments of hypothecation (d).

The contract ought to state the amount of the loan, the interest to be paid, and the property hypothecated for repayment of the loan (e). The name of the ship hypothecated, the voyage for which the loan is made, and the fact that repayment depends upon the safe arrival of the ship or cargo at its destination, should be stated. A bottomry bond may be given at the same time with, and as collateral security for, bills of exchange drawn upon the owner of the ship, so as to be valid in the event of the bills being refused acceptance or dishonoured (f).

If ship, freight, and cargo are hypothecated, the contract is bottomry; where cargo only is hypothecated, the contract is respondentia.

Hypothecation in bottomry or respondentia differs both from a mortgage and from a pawn or pledge. It does not, as a mortgage does, transfer the property in the thing hypothecated to the person making the advance, nor, as in the case of a pawn or pledge, is it necessary to its validity that there should be a transfer of the possession. Hypothecation gives only a right against the subject-matter hypothecated through the medium of process in the Admiralty Division of the High Court (g). There is this further main difference between those contracts and a common loan: the money advanced is at hazard during the voyage (h); so that if the ship or cargo does not arrive safely at its destination nothing is repayable. The lender of the money has, therefore, always been, as we shall immediately see, entitled to receive a recompense far beyond the ordinary rate of interest. This recompense is very properly called in the civil law periculi pretium, and no person can be entitled to it who does not take upon himself the perils of the voyage. But it is not necessary that his doing so should be declared expressly, and in terms, though this is often done: it is sufficient that the fact can be collected from the language of the instrument considered in all its parts. Hence, where the words were, "I bind myself, my ship, and tackle to pay the sum borrowed, with twelve per cent. bottomry premium, in eight days after my arrival at the port of London," the Court were of opinion that the words "my arrival" must be understood to mean my arrival with the ship, or the ship's arrival (i).

Bottomry and Respondentia.

A total loss of the ship, within the meaning of the bottomry bond, cannot happen if it exist in specie, although ever so much injured (k); the doctrine of constructive total loss does not apply. Though arrival of the vessel or cargo is the condition upon which bottomry advances are made, the lender would, it seems, be entitled to recover, if the owner fraudulently refused to proceed with the voyage (l).

Inasmuch as the lender receives nothing unless the subject-matter of hypothecation arrives at its destination, it was always, notwithstanding the Usury Laws, competent to the lender upon a bottomry or respondentia contract to receive any interest whatever (m). If the interest be exorbitant, the Court will have power to reduce it; a power which it is slow to exercise (n). Where no interest is agreed upon, the Court will allow four per cent. (o).

The terms bottomry and respondentia are sometimes incorrectly applied to contracts for the repayment of money borrowed, not on the ship and goods only, but on the mere hazard of the voyage itself; as, where a man lends a merchant 1000*l.* to be employed in a beneficial trade, on condition to be repaid with extraordinary interest in case such a voyage be safely performed, which kind of agreement is called by some writers fœnus nauticum, and by others usura maritima. In these cases the loan is not upon the ship or cargo. The lender has only the personal security of the borrower.

The contracts of bottomry or respondentia are generally entered into by the master acting under an implied authority as the agent of the owner. A bottomry bond may be given by the owner, if both he and the ship be abroad at the time; but against an owner of a British ship in England who raised money upon a bottomry bond for any voyage, the lender could not enforce the bond as a bottomry bond (p). And if the contract refer to a British ship, of which it purports to be an assignment, compliance with the provisions of the Registry Act seems necessary to its validity (q). Neither does there seem to be any mode by which a person who advances money at respondentia, on goods laden and to be laden on board a ship on an outward and homeward voyage, can entitle himself to resort for payment of his debt to the specific goods that may be brought back (r). Only freight to be earned on the voyage for which the advance is made (s), including freight earned from sub-shippers of goods (t), can be hypothecated.

The authority of the master to hypothecate the ship and freight, in case of necessity, and in furtherance of the voyage in which he is engaged (u), at a foreign port, is indisputable (v), and his hypothecation of the freight (x) or cargo is also justifiable, if necessary (y). Neeessity, to use the expression of Lord Stowell, is "the vital principle" of hypothecation, and the Court of Admiralty will consider every circumstance, will go into the whole history of the voyage, in order to determine whether there be that necessity, without which an instrument of hypothecation is void (z). It has been defined by Erle, C. J., as "a high degree of need—a need which arises when choice is to be made of one of several alternatives under the peril of severe loss if a wrong choice should be made" (a). A bond given to free a ship from arrest for salvage would be valid (b); not so one given for paying insurance premiums (c). The advantage of allowing the master to take up money on bottomry consists in its enabling him to procure assistance when no other resource is at hand, and the adventure would be frustrated if assistance were not afforded. Such being the reason for permitting him to borrow money on those terms, it follows that he has no right to do so where he can obtain the money on better terms, ex. gr., on the personal credit of the owner (d); or when he is at the owner's place of residence, and the means of communication with him are open, without his consent (e), for then he has the owner to resort to (f); or where there is a recognized agent of the owner (g). And, with us, all England would, at least before the commencement of the voyage, be considered the owner's residence for this purpose; and so, perhaps, would Ireland since the Union (h), though before that period it was otherwise (i).

It follows, also, that the master ought not to take up money on bottomry, even for a necessary purpose, if it can be procured on more moderate terms.

When the master, finding it absolutely necessary for the purposes of the voyage to obtain money, and being unable to obtain it in any other manner, executes an instrument of hypothecation, the effect of his contract is to give the creditor, not indeed a property in the ship hypothecated, but a privilege or claim upon it, to be carried into effect by legal process (j). responsible, and the lender's remedy was against the master of ship (k).

No person is entitled to make advances on bottomry, who at the time of making them is a debtor in a larger or equal amount to the vessel (l).

But it is no objection to the validity of a bottomry bond, that it is given to the consignee of the cargo; the necessity for borrowing, and the fairness of the transaction, being established (m). The money, however, must have been originally advanced upon the credit of the ship. If it be originally advanced on that of the owner, and such a bond be afterwards given in consequence of doubt arising as to his responsibility, even before the ship leaves the place of advance, the bond will be invalid (n). But if a portion only of the money secured have been thus previously advanced, and the rest of the sum be subsequently lent on the security of the ship, the bond is not void in toto, but only to the extent of the previous advance (o). The person making the advance to the master must ascertain that the ship is in distress, that the master cannot obtain credit, and that the advances are required for necessary purposes (p). He ought also to make inquiries as to communications between the master and the owners where communication is practicable (q). It is clear that the master cannot hypothecate the ship for any debt of his own; though, if she really were in a state of want, and the money bonâ fide advanced to relieve her, his subsequent misapplication of it would not prejudice the lender's remedy (r).

Bottomry and Respondentia.

A bottomry bond may be good in part and bad in part (s); for instance, a bond given for past and present advances may be void only as to the present advances (t); or a bond which hypothecates freight may be good as to the freight to be earned on the voyage for which the advance is made, though invalid as to freight to be earned on other voyages (u).

Where the ship has been hypothecated by the master in a foreign country, the lender has, as we have seen, a privilege or claim against the ship itself, of which he may avail himself as follows:—Upon the arrival of the ship in this country, if the loan be not repaid within the time prescribed, the agent of the lender applies to the Admiralty Division of the High Court, with the instrument of contract, and a proper affidavit of the facts, and obtains a warrant to arrest the ship, and a monition to the persons liable to the freight, if that be charged, to pay it at the registry (x), and cite all persons interested to appear before the Court if they think proper to do so. If, in the course of the proceedings, it becomes necessary to sell the ship, the Court decrees a sale to be made under the direction of its own commissioners, and afterwards distributes the proceeds among the different claimants, as justice requires; and this may be done if the owners or persons interested in the ship do not appear at the time appointed by the Court, otherwise their absence or default would occasion a failure of justice. The claim will, if necessary, be referred to the registrar and merchants to examine the items in respect of which the bond was given.

As to the mode of distributing the proceeds among the several claimants, it is worthy of observation that if securities of this sort are given at different periods of a voyage, and the value of the ship is insufficient to discharge them all, the last in point of date is entitled to priority of payment; because the last loan furnishes the means of preserving the ship, and, without it, the former lenders would have entirely lost their security (y). But this priority may be lost by want of diligence in enforcing a bond; and a voluntary postponement of payment will deprive the Admiralty Court of jurisdiction over it (z).

The validity of a bottomry bond will be determined by the law of the flag of the vessel. "Upon principle, it seems to me," said Brett, L. J., in The Gaetano and Maria (a), "that he who ships goods on board a foreign ship, ships them to be dealt with by the master of that ship according to the law of the country of that ship, unless there is a stipulation to the contrary."

Bottomry bonds have always been assignable in equity and by Admiralty law (b).

A person who has supplied necessaries to a ship has not, under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, or 26 & 27 Vict. c. 24, or otherwise, any maritime lien (c).

CHAPTER VIII.

CONTRACTS OF HIRING AND SERVICE.

Contracts of hiring and service.

THE greater part of the law respecting the relation of master and servant has been treated of in the First Book, under the head of Principal and Agent; for every servant is, in executing the duties required from him by his contract of service, his master's agent. The present chapter will, therefore, only contain a few remarks on the contract by which this relation is created.

Where the hiring is under a special agreement the terms of that agreement must of course be observed (a). If there be no special agreement or no usage or custom, but the hiring is a general one without mention of time, it is considered to be for a year certain. If the servant continue in employment beyond that year, a contract for a second year is implied, and so on (b). Indeed, in case of menial (c) or domestic servants, the contract is, by general custom, dissoluble by a month's warning, or payment of a month's wages (d), and in many trades or professions there are customs as to the length of notice.

Though a hiring in general words is primâ facie presumed to be for a year even though the master and servant may have thought that they could separate within the year (e); and, though the circumstances of the servant's leaving in the middle of a year (f), or having previously served for a shorter time than a year (g), will not prevent the usual interpretation from taking place, yet this presumption, arising from the use of general words, is capable of being rebutted (h). Thus, a general hiring at weekly wages is but a weekly hiring, if there be no other circumstance whence the intended duration of the contract can be collected (i), e. g., a hiring at so much per week "for so long a time as the master shall want a servant," or "for so long a time as the master and servant shall agree," are weekly hirings (k). But if there be any circumstance to show that a yearly hiring was intended, a reservation of wages payable at shorter intervals will not control it (l); as, where the contract was to serve "for four shillings and ninepence a week," or "at the rate of four shillings a week," the parties having liberty of parting at a month's notice from either, this was held to be a hiring for a year, for the mention of a month showed that the stipulation for a weekly payment of wages was not intended to limit the duration of the contract (m). But an indefinite hiring by piecework, or a hiring to do a certain quantity of work, cannot be considered a yearly hiring (n). If the hiring be for a year, to commence at a future day, it must be in writing to satisfy the Statute of Frauds (o).

Contracts of hiring and service.

It was thought to follow, from what is above stated, that, if the master dismissed his servant (hired generally) without cause, the latter would have a right of wages up to the expiration of the year. This notion, however, seems to be erroneous (p). On the other hand, if the servant quit his master causelessly, he will be entitled to no accruing wages (q); nor will he be so, if dismissed before the expiration of his term of service for misconduct (r).

The master will be justified in taking this step by any exhibition of moral turpitude on the part of the servant: e. g., an assault on a maid servant, or the persuasion of an apprentice to elope (s); by a refusal to obey his lawful orders (t), or the servant's unwarrantable absence from his duty (u), even though involuntary, as if he subject himself to imprisonment (v). Though it is otherwise where the absence is warrantable, as, if it be for the purpose of having a severe hurt remedied (x); going to a statute fair to be hired for the ensuing year (y), or looking for another service (z). And a mere temporary absence without leave, involving no immoral purpose, appears not to be a sufficient ground for his dismissal; especially if the master's business be not seriously impeded (a). But if the servant does anything incompatible with the due or faithful discharge of his duty to his master—if a servant is guilty of such a crime outside his service as to make it unsafe for a master to keep him in his employ—he may be dismissed (b). Thus, a clerk having claimed to be a partner, and to transact business as such, his master was held justified in immediately dismissing him from his service (c). And even an isolated case of the receipt of commission by the managing director of a company from persons making contracts with the company, and without the knowledge of the company, will justify them in dismissing him (d). So, where a clerk, employed to make entries in the minute-book of a company, entered a protest against a summons for the appointment of a successor to himself, it was held that a jury were justified in finding this to be a sufficient cause for his dismissal (e). It was further held in that case, and the doctrine has been since confirmed, that a master who has discharged his servant for an insufficient cause, is not precluded from afterwards justifying that dismissal by alleging any sufficient cause that may have been in existence (f).

He does the wrongful act whether such profit be given to him in return for services which he actually performs for the third party, or whether it be given to him for his supposed influence, or whether it be given to him on any other ground at all; if it is a profit which arises out of the transaction it belongs to his master, and the agent or servant has no right to take it, or keep it, or bargain for it, or to receive it without bargain, unless his master knows it." Contracts of hiring and service.

Incompetency of a person hired as a skilled artizan or labourer will justify his dismissal (g). But illness, unless habitual, or incapacitating him from performing his work, is not a ground for dismissal.

At common law the master was not responsible for an injury sustained by the servant in the execution of his orders (h), unless there were personal negligence on his part (i), though it might have been occasioned by the negligence of any of his fellow-servants (k), even if of superior authority (l), if the master had taken care to select competent persons and furnished them with proper materials. He had not, it was said, undertaken to do more, and the servant was content to bear this risk (m). This has been modified by the Employers' Liability Act (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42) in the case of railway servants and workmen to whom the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, applies; that is, the Act does not include a domestic or menial servant, but, save as aforesaid, means any person who, being a labourer, servant in husbandry, journeyman, artificer, handicraftsman, miner, or otherwise engaged in manual labour, whether under twenty-one years or not, has entered into, or works under, a contract with an employer, whether such contract be express or implied, oral or in writing, and be a contract of service or a contract personally to execute any work or labour (n).

Contracts of hiring and service.

Sect. 1 provides that—

"(1) Where personal injury is caused to a workman by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer (o); or

"(2) By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has any superintendence (p) entrusted to him whilst in the exercise of such superintendence; or

"(3) By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was bound to conform, and did conform (q), where such injury resulted from his having so conformed; or

"(4) By reason of the act or omission of any person in the service of the employer done or made in obedience to the rules or bye-laws of the employer, or in obedience to particular instructions given by any person delegated with the authority of the employer, in that behalf; or

"(5) By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has the charge or control of any signals, points, locomotive engine, or train upon a railway" (r).

In these cases the workman is entitled to the same rights and remedies as if he had not been a workman (s). "The Act has placed the workman, with certain exceptions (t), in a position as advantageous as, but no better than, that of the rest of the world who use the master's premises at his invitation on business" (u). Accordingly, to an action under the statute, the master may plead contributory negligence by the servant, or volenti non fit injuria (v).

By the Truck Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37), in contracts of hiring made with artificers, workmen, labourers, or other persons employed in the trades specified in sect. 19 of that Act, the wages must be made payable in the current coin of this realm, and not otherwise. The payment of such wages in any other mode is declared invalid. Nor is the employer allowed to set off goods supplied to the artificer against the wages due to him. Obedience to this Act is enforced by penalties. A payment in bank-notes, with the artificer's consent, is legalised by a proviso in sect. 8. But deductions previously agreed upon, not being in the nature of payment, as for the use of frames supplied by the master and employed in the work, standing room, &c., were held to be legal in Chawner v. Cummings (u). To prevent this was passed 37 & 38 Vict. c. 48, which enacted, as to hosiery manufactures, that all contracts to stop wages, and for frame rents and charges, shall be null and void. The Truck Act, 1831, has been further amended by the 50 & 51 Vict. c. 46, which partly repeals the first Act, and enacts that in actions for wages, a set-off or counter-claim in respect of goods supplied to workmen by their employer or his agent, may not be set up, and that conditions as to spending wages at any shop are invalid (sects. 5 and 6). The Act does not apply to servants in agriculture (x).

46 & 47 Vict. c. 31, prohibits under penalties the payment of wages of workmen in public-houses.

By stat. 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, an agreement or memorandum for the hire of any labourer, artificer, manufacturer, or menial servant is exempt from stamp duty (y).

By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 130, the employment of young persons and women by gangmasters for agricultural purposes is prohibited. There are other statutes regulating the employment in factories and mines (z).

pointing out modes for the enforcement of their rights, and for the arrangement of disputes occurring between masters in particular trades and their servants or workmen (z). But these have now been superseded by the statute 38 & 39 Vict. c. 90, which provides remedies of a civil nature before a county court judge, or, where the sum in dispute does not exceed £10, by summary proceedings before magistrates, and enables those tribunals to administer full justice between both parties. There are also statutes (a) which afford the means of adjusting disputes between masters and workmen by arbitration. These statutes embrace almost all causes of dispute between such parties, and give ample powers for their redress up to a limited amount. The 3rd section of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 96, points out the mode of decision, which is either by the summary award of a justice, if the parties can agree to it; or, if not, by two arbitrators, one chosen by each party out of a number of not less than four, nor more than six, to be named by the justice upon application to him by one of the parties. The other sections provide for the appointment of new arbitrators in case of the neglect or refusal of those first named, the mode of investigation, the powers with which the arbitrators are to be invested for the purpose of procuring evidence, the course to be adopted where they disagree, and the enforcement of the award when made.

A contract of hiring and service, being a purely personal contract, is determined by the death of either party (b); and the inability of the servant from illness will excuse his performance of it (c). If permanent, his illness is a ground for dismissal (d).

(z) By the Master and Servant Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 24), a number of statutes "relating to master and servants in particular manufactures" have been repealed.

CONTRACTS WITH SEAMEN.

SECT. 1. Form of Contract.
2. Duties and Rights of Seamen.
3. Wages, how lost or forfeited.
4. Remedies of Seamen for their Wages.

Contracts with seamen.

THIS subject is regulated by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (a), which consolidated and amended the provisions of the General Merchant Seamen's Act (b), and the Mercantile Marine Act, 1850 (c), and the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1862 (d), 1873 (e), 1876 (f), and 1880 (g).

Special provisions with regard to fishing vessels and apprentices to the sea fishing service are made by the Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act, 1883 (h).

The subject of the present chapter may be most aptly considered under the following heads:—

1. Form of contract.
2. Duties and rights of seamen under it.
3. Wages, how lost or forfeited.
4. Remedies for the recovery of wages.

(a) 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104.

Section I.—Form of Contract.

Form of contract.

With regard to the form of the contract, the 149th section of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, enacts that—

"The master of every ship (i), except ships of less than eighty tons registered tonnage exclusively employed in trading between different ports on the coasts of the United Kingdom (k), shall enter into an agreement with every seaman whom he carries to sea from any port in the United Kingdom as one of his crew in the manner hereinafter mentioned; and every such agreement shall be in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, and shall be dated at the time of the first signature thereof, and shall be signed by the master before any seaman signs the same, and shall contain the following particulars as terms thereof; (that is to say,)

(1.) The nature, and, as far as practicable, the duration (l) of the intended voyage or engagement: [or, instead, may state the maximum period of the voyage or engagement, and the places or parts of the world (if any) to which the voyage or engagement is not to extend (m).]

(2.) The number and description of the crew, specifying how many are engaged as sailors:

(3.) The time at which each seaman is to be on board or to begin work:

(4.) The capacity in which each seaman is to serve:

(5.) The amount of wages which each seaman is to receive (mm):

(6.) A scale of the provisions which are to be furnished to each seaman:

(7.) Any regulations as to conduct on board, and as to fines (n), short allowance of provisions, or other lawful punish-

(i) This applies to all British ships, wherever registered, s. 109; also to sea-going yachts and registered fishing vessels on the coasts and light-house ships: see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 13. As to contracts with fishermen, see 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 8, and s. 55.

(l) In Frazer v. Hatton, 2 C. B. N. S. 512, a voyage from Liverpool to the West Coast of Africa and back, or for a term not to exceed three years, though in the alternative, was held a sufficient compliance with this ordinance, and a provision that the crew might be transferred to any other ship in the same employ upheld.

(m) The alternative statement within brackets is provided by 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 7.

ments for misconduct, which have been sanctioned by the Board of Trade as regulations proper to be adopted, and which the parties agree to adopt:

And every such agreement shall be so framed as to admit of stipulations to be adopted at the will of the master and seamen in each case, as to advance and allotment of wages, and may contain any other stipulations which are not contrary to law (o): Provided, that if the master of any ship belonging to any British possession has an agreement with his crew made in due form according to the law of the possession to which such ship belongs, or in which her crew were engaged, and engages single seamen in the United Kingdom, such seamen may sign the agreement so made, and it shall not be necessary for them to sign an agreement in the form sanctioned by the Board of Trade."

Sect. 150 also enacts, that—

"In the case of all foreign-going ships, in whatever part of her Majesty's dominions the same are registered, the following rules shall be observed with respect to agreements; (that is to say,)

(1.) Every agreement made in the United Kingdom (except in such cases of agreements with substitutes as are hereinafter specially provided for) shall be signed by each seaman in the presence of a shipping master:

(2.) Such shipping master shall cause the agreement to be read over and explained to each seaman, or otherwise ascertain that each seaman understands the same before he signs it, and shall attest each signature:

(3.) When the crew is first engaged the agreement shall be signed in duplicate, and one part shall be retained by the shipping master, and the other part shall contain a special place or form for the descriptions and signatures of substitutes or persons engaged subsequently to the first departure of the ship, and shall be delivered to the master:

(4.) In the case of substitutes engaged in the place of seamen who have duly signed the agreement, and whose services are lost within twenty-four hours of the ship's putting to sea by death, desertion, or other unforeseen cause, the engagement shall, when practicable, be made before some shipping master duly appointed in the manner hereinbefore specified; and whenever such last-mentioned engagement cannot be so made, the master shall, before the ship puts to sea, if practicable, and if not, as soon afterwards as possible, cause the agreement to be read over and explained to the seamen; and the seamen shall thereupon sign the same in the presence of a witness, who shall attest their signatures." Form of contract.

Running agreements may, however, be entered into in certain cases, on the following terms—

Sect. 151. "In the case of foreign-going ships making voyages averaging less than six months in duration, running agreements with the crew may be made to extend over two or more voyages, so that no such agreement shall extend beyond the next following thirtieth day of June, or thirty-first day of December, or the first arrival of the ship at her port of destination in the United Kingdom after such date, or the discharge of cargo consequent upon such arrival; and every person entering into such agreement, whether engaged upon the first commencement thereof or otherwise, shall enter into and sign the same in the manner hereby required for other foreign-going ships; and every person engaged thereunder, if discharged in the United Kingdom, shall be discharged in the manner hereby required for the discharge of seamen belonging to other foreign-going ships.

Sect. 152. "The master of every foreign-going ship for which such a running agreement as aforesaid is made shall, upon every return to any port in the United Kingdom before the final termination of the agreement, discharge or engage before the shipping-master at such port any seaman whom he is required by law so to discharge or engage, and shall upon every such return indorse on the agreement a statement (as the case may be), either that no such discharges or engagements have been made or are intended to be made before the ship again leaves port, or that all such discharges or engagements have been duly made as hereinbefore required, and shall deliver the agreement so indorsed to the shipping master; and any master who wilfully makes a false statement in such indorsement shall incur a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds; and the shipping master shall also sign an indorsement on the agreement to the effect that the provisions of this Act relating to such agreement have been complied with, and shall redeliver the agreement so indorsed to the master."

Form of contract.

With respect to home-trade ships, s. 155 enacts that—

"In the case of home-trade ships, crews or single seamen may, if the master thinks fit, be engaged before a shipping master in the manner hereinbefore directed with respect to foreign-going ships; and in every case in which the engagement is not so made, the master shall, before the ship puts to sea, if practicable, and if not, as soon afterwards as possible, cause the agreement to be read over and explained to each seaman, and the seaman shall thereupon sign the same in the presence of a witness, who shall attest his signature."

The statute, by s. 156, likewise provides that—

"In cases where several home-trade ships belong to the same owner, the agreement with the seaman may, notwithstanding anything herein contained, be made by the owner instead of by the master, and the seamen may be engaged to serve in any two or more of such ships (p), provided that the names of the ships and the nature of the service are specified in the agreement; but, with the foregoing exception, all provisions herein contained which relate to ordinary agreements for home-trade ships shall be applicable to agreements made in pursuance of this section."

Sect. 157 of the same statute enacts that—

"If in any case a master carries any seaman to sea without entering into an agreement (q) with him in the form and manner, and at the place and time hereby in such case required, the master in the case of a foreign-going ship, and the master or owner in the case of a home-trade ship, shall for each such offence incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds."

Seamen engaged in any colony, for any ship registered in the United Kingdom, or for any ship registered in another colony, must be engaged before a shipping master or officer appointed to engage seamen, and if there be none such, then before an officer of customs (r). Masters engaging seamen for a British ship in any foreign country must do so before a British consular officer, if there be one (s).

(p) See Frazer v. Hatton, 2 C. B. N. S. 512.

(q) But the omission, it would seem, does not render the ship unseaworthy, or the voyage illegal; the provision is simply for the protection of the seamen. Redmond v. Smith, 7 M. & G. 457.

(r) 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 159.

With respect to these agreements, it is further provided by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 161— Form of contract.

"(4.) The master of every foreign-going ship shall, within forty-eight hours after the ship's arrival at her final port of destination in the United Kingdom, or upon the discharge of the crew, whichever first happens, deliver such agreement to a shipping master at the place; and such shipping master shall thereupon give to the master a certificate of such delivery; and no officer of customs shall clear any foreign-going ship inwards without the production of such certificate:

And if the master of any foreign-going ship fails to deliver the agreement to a shipping master at the time and in the manner hereby directed, he shall for every default incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds."

Then by sect. 162—

"The following rules shall be observed with respect to the production of agreements and certificates of competency or service for home-trade ships; (that is to say,)

(1.) In the case of home-trade ships of more than eighty tons burden, no agreement shall extend beyond the next following thirtieth day of June or thirty-first day of December, or the first arrival of the ship at her final port of destination in the United Kingdom after such date, or the discharge of cargo consequent upon such arrival:

(2.) The master or owner of every such ship shall, within twenty-one days after the thirtieth day of June and the thirty-first day of December in every year, transmit or deliver to some shipping master in the United Kingdom every agreement made within the six calendar months next preceding such days respectively, and shall also, in the case of home-trade passenger ships, produce to the shipping master the certificates of competency or service which the said master, and his first or only mate, as the case may be, are hereby required to possess:

(3.) The shipping master shall thereupon give to the master or owner a certificate of such delivery and production; and no officer of customs shall grant a clearance or transire for any such ship as last aforesaid, without the production of such certificate; and if any such ship attempts to ply or go to sea without such clearance or transire, any such officer may detain her until the said certificate is produced:

And if the agreement for any home-trade ship is not delivered or transmitted by the master or owner to a shipping master at the time and in the manner hereby directed, such master or owner shall for every default incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds."

Provision is made for the authentication of any erasure, interlineation, or alteration in the agreement by the attestation of some shipping master, justice, officer of customs, or other public functionary, or (if made out of her Majesty's dominions) of a British consular officer, or, where there is no such officer, of two respectable British merchants. Without such authentication such erasure, &c., is to be wholly inoperative (t); and likewise a penalty is imposed for any fraudulent alteration or delivering a false copy (u).

Then, by sect. 165, it is provided that—

"Any seaman may bring forward evidence to prove the contents of any agreement or otherwise to support his case, without producing or giving notice to produce the agreement or any copy thereof."

And, by sect. 166—

"The master shall, at the commencement of every voyage or engagement, cause a legible copy of the agreement (omitting the signatures) to be placed or posted up in such part of the ship as to be accessible to the crew, and in default shall for each offence incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds."

It was decided under the former Acts (consolidated by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854), that, though an agreement contrary to their provisions was void, it was not avoided in consequence of its containing stipulations in addition to those given in the Act, if not contrary to them in letter or spirit (x). Indeed, the Acts themselves, by invalidating certain clauses tending to deprive the seamen of advantages, it was thought, impliedly recognised the power of introducing others not having a tyrannical or unreasonable operation; and considerable latitude seems to be allowed by the foregoing enactment. In construing all contracts made by seamen, however, the Courts follow out the politic inclination of the legislature to protect and favour that deserving class of labourers. And it has been expressly stated in the Court of Admiralty (y) that the tribunal will bear in mind the general ignorance and improvidence of seamen, and their inability to appreciate the meaning and effect of a long and multifarious instrument. The master, therefore, will not be allowed to obtain any advantage from the use of general or ambiguous terms, such, for instance, as "to New South Wales or elsewhere" (z). It was held, too, under the former Acts, that, where a written agreement had been made, it was the only evidence of the contract, and that no new term could be introduced by parol (a). Form of contract.

Any person not licensed by the Board of Trade, other than the owner (b), master, mate of a ship, some person bonâ fide the servant and in the constant employ of the owner, or a duly appointed shipping master, who engages or supplies any seaman or apprentice to be entered on board any ship in the United Kingdom, incurs a penalty of 20*l.* (c).

Contracts with seamen are exempt from stamp duty (d). Such contracts may, under the Merchant Shipping (Payment of Wages and Rating) Act, 1880, s. 8, be rescinded.

"Where a proceeding is instituted in or before any Court in relation to any dispute between an owner or master of a ship and a seaman, or apprentice to the sea service, arising out of or incidental to their relation as such, or is instituted for the purpose of this section, the Court, if having regard to all the circumstances of the case they think it is just so to do, may rescind any contract between the owner or master and the seaman or apprentice, or any contract of apprenticeship, upon such terms as the Court may think just, and this power shall be in addition to any other jurisdiction which the Court can exercise independently of this section" (e).

Sect. 11 of the same Act extends the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (f), to seamen and apprentices. The remedies given by sect. 243 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (g), are in substitution for any other remedy against seamen for breach of contract; and a shipowner cannot recover damages under sect. 4 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, though the damages claimed are under 10*l.* (h). The Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), does not apply to seamen (i).

Section II.—Duties and Rights of Seamen under the Contract.

Duties and rights of seamen under the contract.

The first duty of the seaman under the contract is, of course, to join and work the ship on board of which he has engaged to serve (k), and obey the master: and the due performance of his contract is thus enforced by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 243 (l), viz.:—

"Whenever any seaman who has been lawfully engaged, or any apprentice to the sea service commits any of the following offences, he shall be liable to be punished summarily as follows; (that is to say,)

(1.) For desertion (m) he shall be liable to forfeit all or any part of the clothes and effects he leaves on board, and all or any part of the wages or emoluments which he has then earned, and also, if such desertion takes place abroad, at the discretion of the Court, to forfeit all or any part of the wages or emoluments he may earn in any other ship in which he may be employed until his next return to the United Kingdom, and to satisfy any excess of wages paid by the master or owner of the ship from which he deserts, to any substitute engaged in his place at a higher rate of wages than the rate stipulated to be paid to him:

(e) 43 & 44 Vict. c. 16, s. 8. For the purposes of this section, the term "Court" includes any magistrate or justice having jurisdiction in the matter to which the proceeding relates.

(m) As to what constitutes desertion, see post, pp. 552, 553. By 52 & 53 Vict. c. 46, s. 3 (see Appendix), a register of deserters is to be kept by the superintendents of mercantile marine offices.

Duties and rights of seamen under the contract.

(2.) For neglecting or refusing without reasonable cause to join his ship, or to proceed to sea in his ship, or for absence without leave at any time within twenty-four hours of the ship's sailing from any port, either at the commencement or during the progress of any voyage, or for absence at any time without leave and without sufficient reason from his ship or from his duty, not amounting to desertion, or not treated as such by the master, he shall be liable to forfeit out of his wages a sum not exceeding the amount of two days' pay, and in addition, for every twonty-four hours of absence, either a sum not exceeding six days' pay, or any expenses which have been properly incurred in hiring a substitute :

(3.) For quitting the ship without leave after her arrival at her port of delivery and before she is placed in security, he shall be liable to forfeit out of his wages a sum not exceeding one month's pay :

(4.) For wilful disobedience to any lawful command, he shall be liable to imprisonment for any period not exceeding four weeks, with or without hard labour ; and also at the discretion of the Court to forfeit out of his wages a sum not exceeding two days' pay :

(5.) For continued wilful disobedience to lawful commands, or continued wilful neglect of duty, he shall be liable to imprisonment for any period not exceeding twelve weeks, with or without hard labour ; and also, at the discretion of the Court, to forfeit for every twenty-four hours' continuance of such disobedience or neglect, either a sum not exceeding six days' pay, or any expenses which have been properly incurred in hiring a substitute :

(6.) For assaulting any master or mate he shall be liable to imprisonment for any period not exceeding twelve weeks, with or without hard labour :

(7.) For combining with any other or others of the crew to disobey lawful commands, or to neglect duty, or to impede the navigation of the ship or the progress of the voyage, he shall be liable to imprisonment for any period not exceeding twelve weeks, with or without hard labour :

(8.) For wilfully damaging the ship, or embezzling or wilfully damaging any of her stores or cargo, he shall be liable to forfeit out of his wages a sum equal in amount to the loss thereby sustained, and also, at the discretion of the Court, to imprisonment for any period not exceeding twelve weeks, with or without hard labour :

Duties and rights of seamen under the contract.

(9.) For any act of smuggling of which he is convicted, and whereby loss or damage is occasioned to the master or owner, he shall be liable to pay to such master or owner such a sum as is sufficient to reimburse the master or owner for such loss or damage; and the whole or a proportionate part of his wages may be retained in satisfaction or on account of such liability, without prejudice to such further remedy."

Where a remedy for the seaman's breach of contract exists under this section, the right to resort to any other remedy is by implication excluded (n).

If the seaman or apprentice commit any of the offences mentioned in the above section, an entry (o) is to be made of the facts in the official log, and signed by the master as well as the mate or one of the crew, and of this a copy is to be furnished to the offender, or it is to be read over to him if he be in the ship, and any reply he may make is likewise to be entered in the log.

In order to secure the services of the seamen on board, a summary power of apprehending deserters without warrant was given to the master or owner by sect. 246 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. This section and sect. 248 of the same Act have been repealed by 43 & 44 Vict. c. 16, s. 12, and by sect. 10 of the latter Act it is provided as follows:

Sect. 10. "The following provisions shall, from the commencement of this Act, have operation within the United Kingdom:

"A seaman or apprentice to the sea service shall not be liable to imprisonment for deserting, or for neglecting, or refusing, without reasonable cause, to join his ship, or to proceed to sea in his ship, or for absence without leave at any time within twenty-four hours of his ship's sailing from any port, or for absence at any time without leave, and without sufficient reason, from his ship, or from his duty.

"Whenever, either at the commencement or during the progress of any voyage, any seaman or apprentice neglects or refuses to join, or deserts from, or refuses to proceed to sea in any ship in which he is duly engaged to serve, or is found otherwise absenting himself therefrom without leave, the master or any mate, or the owner, ship's husband, or consignee, may, with or without the assistance of the local police officers or constables, who are hereby directed to give the same, if required, convey him on board; provided that if the seaman or apprentice so requires he shall first be taken before some Court capable of taking cognizance of the matters to be dealt with according to law; and that if it appears to the Court before which the case is brought that the seaman or apprentice has been conveyed on board or taken before the Court on improper or insufficient grounds, the master, mate, owner, ship's husband, or consignee, as the case may be, shall incur a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, but such penalty, if inflicted, shall be a bar to any action for false imprisonment.

Duties and rights of seamen under the contract.

"If a seaman or apprentice to the sea service intends to absent himself from his ship or his duty, he may give notice of his intention, either to the owner or to the master of the ship, not less than forty-eight hours before the time at which he ought to be on board his ship; and in the event of such notice being given, the Court shall not exercise any of the powers conferred on it by sect. 247 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854.

"Subject to the foregoing provision of this section, the powers conferred by sect. 247 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, may be exercised, notwithstanding the abolition of imprisonment for desertion and similar offences, and of apprehension without warrant.

Sect. 247 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (as amended by 43 & 44 Vict. c. 16, s. 12), is as follows:—

Sect. 247. "Whenever any seaman or apprentice is brought before any Court on the ground of his having neglected or refused to join or to proceed to sea in any ship in which he is engaged to serve, or of having deserted or otherwise absented himself therefrom without leave, such Court may, if the master or the owner or his agent so requires, ... cause him to be conveyed on board for the purpose of proceeding on the voyage, or deliver him to the master or any mate of the ship, or the owner or his agent, to be by them so conveyed, and may in such case order any costs and expenses properly incurred by or on behalf of the master or owner by reason of the offence to be paid by the offender, and, if necessary, to be deducted from any wages which he has then earned, or which by virtue of his then existing engagement he may afterwards earn."

There being an implied obligation in the contract that means shall have been taken to insure the seaworthiness of the ship, the breach of this would, of course, form an answer to any charge of desertion or complaint of refusal to proceed in her on the part of the seaman; but he may, instead of doing this, complain that she is unsafe to the Board of Trade, who may detain her and investigate the matter. If this complaint be made by an individual the Board may require of the complainant security for costs and compensation to the owner for his loss by reason of its detention and survey, should it be found that there was not reasonable or probable cause for them; but if the complaint be made by one-fourth of the crew, being not less than three, and the Board or its officers think this not frivolous or vexatious, this security may be dispensed with (p).

The next duty of a seaman under this contract is to exert himself to the utmost in the service of the ship (q). Therefore, any promise of extra pay as an inducement to extraordinary exertion in that respect is nudum pactum, and void (r). If the services are such as he is not bound to perform—if, for instance, a ship is so short-handed that the completion of her voyage becomes unsafe, and the master voluntarily promises the remaining seamen a sum of money in addition to their wages for completing the voyage—this remuneration for extraordinary services may be recovered (s). Where a ship had been abandoned by the master, the crew were entitled to salvage for salvage services afterwards rendered by them (t). If he is promoted during the voyage, he may recover the wages of his new position (u). If he be improperly discharged, before or at the commencement of the voyage, the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 167, enacts, that—

"Any seaman who has signed an agreement, and is afterwards

By sect. 239 of the same statute any seaman who, by wilful breach or neglect of duty, or drunkenness, does any act tending to the loss, destruction or serious damage of the ship, or the life or limb of any one on board, or refuses or omits to do any act proper or requisite to be done by him for preserving the ship from immediate loss, destruction, or serious damage, or preserving any person on board from immediate danger of life or limb, is guilty of a misdemeanour.

discharged before the commencement of the voyage, or before one month's wages are earned, without fault on his part justifying such discharge, and without his consent, shall be entitled to receive from the master or owner, in addition to any wages he may have earned, due compensation for the damage thereby caused to him, not exceeding one month's wages, and may, on adducing such evidence as the Court hearing the case deems satisfactory of his having been so improperly discharged as aforesaid, recover such compensation as if it were wages duly earned."

Duties and rights of seamen under the contract.

A seaman will have a right to his full wages, although prevented by a hurt received in the performance of his duty, or by sickness, from performing his service, if he remain with the ship (v), unless the illness has been caused by his own wilful act or default (x). The statutes 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 185, 209, 210, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 19, contain provisions for the payment of wages due to seamen left behind under a certificate of their not being in a condition to proceed on the voyage. A seaman also has a right to wages during an embargo, provided that the ship afterwards perform her voyage (y). But if he is sent home as a witness by the consul or other lawful authority, and does not rejoin his ship, he cannot recover wages accruing after he quitted her (z). If a seaman die during the voyage, his representatives may claim his wages pro ratâ (a).

By statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 (b), it is provided, that a seaman may leave his ship for the purpose of forthwith entering the Queen's naval service without forfeiture of wages, notwithstanding his agreement; and the master must deliver to the seaman his clothes and effects, and must pay a proportionate amount of his wages, either in money or by bill drawn on the owners at sight, to the officer in command of the Queen's ship, and the money or produce of the bill is ultimately (c) to be paid to the seaman. If the bill be not paid, the seaman may sue on it, or recover the wages due to him in the ordinary course. But in order to compensate the shipowner for any loss (d), if the seaman has quitted without the consent of the master or owner, who is compelled to provide a substitute, and his wages exceed the amount the original seaman would have received, the master or owner may obtain the difference from Government.

With respect to the time from which the seaman's wages begin, the statute, sect. 181, provides that—

"A seaman's right to wages and provisions shall be taken to commence, either at the time at which he commences work, or at the time specified in the agreement for his commencement of work or presence on board, whichever first happens."

With respect to the time for the payment of the wages, the decision in Button v. Thompson (e) is important. There the seaman's agreement was in the form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, for a voyage from Shields to Alexandria, and, if required, to any port or ports in the Mediterranean, Black Sea, Danube, &c., and home to the ship's final port of discharge in the United Kingdom or Continent of Europe, the voyage not expected to exceed twelve months. The seaman, through his own negligence and misconduct, was left behind at a port in the Danube. It was held that he might recover wages up to the time of being left behind; for that the contract was for a succession of voyages of indefinite duration, though "not expected to exceed twelve months," and that his wages, though, perhaps, not recoverable till the expiration of the stipulated period of service, were yet vested and a debt at the end of each month of service, subject only to forfeiture in certain events. The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, by s. 168, enacts that—

"All stipulations for the allotment of any part of the wages of a seaman during his absence, which are made at the commencement of the voyage, shall be inserted in the agreement (f), and shall state the amounts and times of the payments to be made; and all allotment notes shall be in forms sanctioned by the Board of Trade."

(c) But not until the time he would have been entitled to receive his wages, if he had remained in the service of the ship he has quitted.

(d) By sect. 216, if wages have been advanced, or the owner or master has made himself liable for wages in advance, he may be recompensed by the Admiralty.

Duties and rights of seamen under the contract.

And now, by 43 & 44 Vict. c. 16, s. 3, if the seaman so requires, the agreement with him shall stipulate for the allotment of a part of his wages, not exceeding one-half, in favour of certain relatives (i.e., his wife, father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, child, grandchild, brother or sister), or the allotment may be made in favour of a savings bank. This section also provides that—

"A payment under an allotment note shall begin at the expiration of one month, or, if the allotment is in favour of a savings bank, of three months, from the date of the agreement, or at such later date as may be fixed by the agreement, and shall be paid at the expiration of every subsequent month, or of such other periods as may be fixed by the agreement, and shall be paid only in respect of wages earned before the date of payment."

Means are provided (g) for enforcing, in the County Court or summarily, payment by relatives of the seaman of any allotment note thus issued, provided the owner does not prove that the wages have been forfeited. This provision is confined to the actual owner, who has the management of the ship for the time being (h).

By s. 187 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, it is enacted that—

"The master or owner of every ship shall pay to every seaman his wages within the respective periods following (that is to say), in the case of a home-trade ship, within two days after the termination of the agreement, or at the time when such seaman is discharged, whichever first happens; and in the case of all other ships (except ships employed in the southern whale fishery or on other voyages, for which seamen by the terms of their agreement are wholly compensated by shares in the profits of the adventure), within three days after the cargo has been delivered, or within five days after the seaman's discharge, whichever first happens; and in all cases the seaman shall, at the time of his discharge, be entitled to be paid on account a sum equal to one-fourth part of the balance due to him; and every master or owner who neglects or refuses to make payment in manner aforesaid, without sufficient cause (i), shall pay to the seaman a sum not exceeding the amount of two days' pay for each of the days, not exceeding ten days, during which payment is delayed beyond the respective periods aforesaid, and such sum shall be recoverable as wages."

Conditional advance notes were declared illegal by 43 & 44 Vict. c. 16, s. 2. But this provision was repealed by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 46), which (s. 2) enacts that—

"(1.) Any agreement with a seaman made under section 149 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, may contain a stipulation for payment to or on behalf of the seamen, conditionally on his going to sea in pursuance of the agreement, of a sum not exceeding the amount of one month's wages payable to the seaman under the agreement.

"(2.) Save as authorized by this section, any agreement by or on behalf of the employer of a seaman for the payment of money to or on behalf of the seaman conditionally on his going to sea from any port in the United Kingdom shall be void, and no money paid in satisfaction or in respect of any such agreement shall be deducted from the seaman's wages, and no person shall have any right of action, suit, or set off against the seaman or his assignee in respect of any money so paid or purporting to have been so paid."

With respect to the mode of payment, by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 170, all seamen discharged in the United Kingdom from any British foreign-going ship must, under a penalty of 10*l.*, be discharged and receive their wages in the presence of a superintendent, except in cases where a competent Court otherwise directs. In the case of home-trade ships seamen may, if the owner desires, be discharged and receive their wages in the like manner.

Not less than twenty-four hours (j) before paying off or discharging any seaman, the master shall deliver to him, or if he is to be discharged before a superintendent, to such superintendent, a full and true account, in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, of his wages and all deductions therefrom, and in default shall forfeit 10*l.* No deduction is to be allowed, except in respect of matter subsequent, unless it be included in such statement (k).

(k) Ibid.

Upon the discharge (l) of any seaman, or payment of his wages, the master shall sign and give him a certificate, in a prescribed form, specifying the period of service, and time and place of discharge; and the master's refusal to give it subjects him to a penalty not exceeding 10*l.* The superintendent is empowered (m) finally to hear and decide any question between a master or owner and any of the crew which both parties agree by writing to submit to him; and for this purpose he is armed with authority to call for the log-book and papers (n), and to examine witnesses.

Duties and rights of seamen under the contract.

Now 43 & 44 Vict. c. 16, s. 4, provides that—

"In the case of foreign-going ships—

(1.) The owner or master of the ship shall pay to each seaman on account at the time when he lawfully leaves the ship at the end of his engagement 2*l.*, or one-fourth of the balance due to him, whichever is least, and shall pay him the remainder of his wages within two clear days (exclusive of any Sunday, fast day in Scotland, or bank holiday) after he so leaves the ship.

(2.) The master of the ship may deliver the account of wages mentioned in sect. 171 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, to the seaman himself at or before the time when he leaves the ship, instead of delivering it to a superintendent of a mercantile marine office.

(3.) If the seaman consents the final settlement of his wages may be left to the superintendent of a mercantile marine office, under regulations to be made by the Board of Trade, and the receipt of the superintendent shall in that case operate as a release by the seaman, under sect. 175 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854.

(4.) In the event of the seaman's wages or any part thereof not being paid or settled as in this section mentioned, then, unless the delay is due to the act or default of the seaman, or to any reasonable dispute as to liability, or to any other cause not being the act or default of the owner or master, the seaman's wages shall continue to run and be payable until the time of the final settlement thereof.

(5.) Where a question as to wages is raised before the superintendent of a mercantile marine office between the master or owner of a ship and a seaman or apprentice, if the amount in question does not exceed 5*l.*, the superintendent may adjudicate, and the decision of the superintendent in the matter shall be final; but if the superintendent is of opinion that the question is one which ought to be decided by a court of law, he may refuse to decide it."

By sect. 175 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (o)—

"The following rules shall be observed with respect to the settlement of wages: (that is to say,)

(1). Upon the completion before a shipping master of any discharge and settlement, the master or owner and each seaman shall respectively, in the presence of the shipping master, sign, in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, a mutual release of all claims in respect of the past voyage or engagement, and the shipping master shall also sign and attest it, and shall retain and transmit it as herein directed:

(2.) Such release, so signed and attested, shall operate as a mutual discharge and settlement of all demands between the parties thereto in respect of the past voyage or engagement:

(3.) A copy of such release, certified under the hand of such shipping master to be a true copy, shall be given by him to any party thereto requiring the same; and such copy shall be receivable in evidence upon any future question touching such claims as aforesaid, and shall have all the effect of the original of which it purports to be a copy:

(4.) In cases in which discharge and settlement before a shipping master are hereby required, no payment, receipt, settlement or discharge otherwise made shall operate or be admitted as evidence of the release or satisfaction of any claim:

(5.) Upon any payment being made by a master before a shipping master, the shipping master shall, if required, sign and give to such master a statement of the whole amount so paid; and such statement shall, as between the master and his employer, be received as evidence that he has made the payments therein mentioned."

The master is also (p), upon every discharge before a superintendent, to sign, in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, a report of the conduct, character, and qualifications of the persons discharged, or state, in a column for that purpose, that he declines to give any opinion upon such particulars or any of them. The superintendent is to transmit this to the Registrar-General of Seamen, or such other person as the Board of Trade directs, and also, if desired to do so by the seaman, give him, or indorse on his certificate of discharge, a copy of so much of the report as concerns him.

Duties and rights of seamen under the contract.

With respect to the discharge of seamen abroad, and to prevent the improper leaving behind, or forcing of them on shore, the following provisions are made by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (q):—

Sect. 205. "Whenever any British ship is transferred or disposed of at any place out of her Majesty's dominions, and any seaman or apprentice belonging thereto does not, in the presence of some British consular officer, or, if there be no such consular officer there, in the presence of one or more respectable British merchants residing at the place, and not interested in the said ship, signify his consent in writing to complete the voyage if continued, and whenever the service of any seaman or apprentice belonging to any British ship terminates at any place out of her Majesty's dominions, the master shall give to each such seaman or apprentice a certificate of discharge in the form sanctioned by the Board of Trade as aforesaid, and in the case of any certificated mate whose certificate he has retained, shall return such certificate to him, and shall also, besides paying the wages to which such seaman or apprentice is entitled, either provide him with adequate employment on board some other British ship bound to the port in her Majesty's dominions at which he was originally shipped, or to some other port in the United Kingdom as is agreed upon by him, or furnish the means of sending him back to such port, or provide him with a passage home, or deposit with such consular officer or such merchant or merchants as aforesaid such a sum of money as is by such officer or merchants deemed sufficient to defray the expenses of his subsistence and passage home, and such expenses shall be a charge upon the ship and may be recovered from the owners."

Sect. 206. "If the master or any other person belonging to any British ship wrongfully forces on shore and leaves behind, or otherwise wilfully and wrongfully leaves behind, in any place, on shore or at sea, in or out of her Majesty's dominions, any seaman or apprentice belonging to such ship before the completion of the voyage for which such person was engaged, or the return of the ship to the United Kingdom, he shall for each such offence be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour."

Sect. 207. "If the master of any British ship does any of the following things: (that is to say,)

(1.) Discharges any seaman or apprentice in any place situate in any British possession abroad (except the possession in which he was shipped), without previously obtaining the sanction in writing endorsed on the agreement of some public shipping master, or other officer duly appointed by the local government in that behalf, or (in the absence of any such functionary) of the Chief Officer of Customs resident at or near the place where the discharge takes place:

(2.) Discharges any seaman or apprentice at any place out of her Majesty's dominions, without previously obtaining the sanction so endorsed as aforesaid of the British consular officer there, or (in his absence) of two respectable merchants resident there:

(3.) Leaves behind any seaman or apprentice at any place situate in any British possession abroad on any ground whatever, without previously obtaining a certificate in writing so endorsed as aforesaid from such officer or person as aforesaid, stating the fact and the cause thereof, whether such cause be unfitness or inability to proceed to sea, or desertion or disappearance:

(4.) Leaves behind any seaman or apprentice at any place out of her Majesty's dominions, on shore or at sea, on any ground whatever, without previously obtaining the certificate, endorsed in manner and to the effect last aforesaid, of the British consular officer there, or (in his absence) of two respectable merchants, if there is any such at or near the place where the ship then is:

He shall for each such default be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour: and the said functionaries shall, and the said merchants may, examine into the grounds of such proposed discharge, or into the allegation of such unfitness, inability, desertion, or disappearance as aforesaid, in a summary way, and may for that purpose, if they think fit so to do, administer oaths, and may either grant or refuse such sanction or certificate as appears to them to be just."

The burden of proving such sanction or certificate is thrown upon the master (r); and in the case of distressed seamen being found abroad, who may have been shipwrecked, discharged, or left abroad, provisions are made (s) for their relief and conveyance home, out of the moneys granted for the relief of distressed seamen.

By sect. 213 it is then provided—

"If any seaman or apprentice belonging to any British ship is discharged or left behind, at any place out of the United Kingdom, without full compliance on the part of the master with all the provisions in that behalf in this Act contained, and becomes distressed, and is relieved under the provisions of this Act, or if any subject of her Majesty, after having been engaged by any person (whether acting as principal or agent) to serve in any ship belonging to any foreign power, or to the subject of any foreign power, becomes distressed and is relieved as aforesaid, the wages (if any) due to such seaman or apprentice, and all expenses incurred for his subsistence, necessary clothing, conveyance home, and burial, in case he should die abroad before reaching home, shall be charged upon the ship, whether British or foreign, to which he so belonged as aforesaid," &c. (t).

The Board of Trade, besides suing for any penalties, may sue for or recover the wages and costs either from the master, owner, or the person with whom the engagement was made.

At common law the owner of a ship did not warrant to the seaman that she was seaworthy (u). Now, however, it is enacted by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1876 (x), that—

"In every contract of service express or implied between the owner of a ship and the master or any seaman thereof, and in every instrument of apprenticeship whereby any person is bound to serve as an apprentice on board any ship, there shall be implied, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, an obligation on the owner of the ship, that the owners of the ship, and the master and every agent charged with the loading of the ship, or the preparing thereof for sea, or the sending thereof to sea, shall use all reasonable means to insure the seaworthiness of the ship for the voyage at the time when the voyage commences, and to keep her in a seaworthy condition for the voyage during the same: provided that nothing in this section shall subject the owner of a ship to any liability by reason of the ship being sent to sea in an unseaworthy state, where, owing to special circumstances, the so sending thereof to sea is reasonable and justifiable."

Regulations are contained in the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 and 1867 (q), enabling seamen to complain of bad provisions, to recover compensation for the bad quality, or the reduction of their allowance, and securing a supply for them of proper medicine and anti-scorbutics; and in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1867 (r), prescribing the accommodation to which they shall be entitled on board. By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (s), the expense of providing surgical and medical advice, with attendance and medicine for any seaman receiving injury in the service of the ship, as well as of his subsistence, until he is cured, brought home, or dies, and, if he die, of his burial, is to be borne by the owner. By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1867 (t), if a seaman who is ill has not been provided with proper food, medicine, &c., and the illness has not arisen from other causes, the owner or master will be liable to pay all expenses incurred by reason of such illness, not exceeding three months' pay.

Section III.—Wages, how lost or forfeited.

Wages, how lost or forfeited.

The wages of seamen, whether hired by the voyage or the month, are sometimes lost and sometimes forfeited. By the common law, freight was said to be the mother of wages; and if during the voyage a total loss or capture of the ship took place the seamen lost their wages (x). But if there were an outward and a homeward voyage, they were entitled to wages for the former, if the ship were lost during the latter, unless the two were by agreement consolidated into one (y); for then no freight would have been earned. So, if there were several cargoes and several voyages, they had a right to wages up to the conclusion of the last. If the ship went out empty to look for freight, and returned without procuring any, the seamen were entitled to their wages (z); and when money had been advanced to the owner in part of freight, they had a right to wages pro ratâ out of that, although the vessel had been wrecked before the termination of the voyage (a). If, in case of a wreck, the cargo were saved, and the merchant paid part of the freight in respect thereof, the seamen seem, both on principle and authority, to have been entitled to part of their wages (b). Indeed, it was questioned whether their right to this part could be prevented from accruing by an express stipulation in the contract of hiring; but it was at last settled that, in a court of common law at least, it might be so (c). And it was held, where by great labour they had saved part of the ship, that they were entitled to wages out of the produce (d).

Wages, how lost or forfeited.

Now the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, by sect. 183 (e), provides with respect to all British, including colonial (f), ships, that—

"No right to wages shall be dependent on the earning of freight: and every seaman and apprentice who would be entitled to demand and recover any wages if the ship in which he has served had earned freight, shall, subject to all other rules of law and conditions applicable to the case, be entitled to claim and recover the same, notwithstanding that freight has not been earned; but in all cases of wreck or loss of the ship, proof that he has not exerted himself to the utmost to save the ship, cargo, and stores shall bar his claim."

No seaman, too, shall by any agreement forfeit his lien on the ship, or be deprived of any remedy for the recovery of his wages; and every stipulation by which any seaman consents to abandon his right to wages in the case of the loss of the ship, or any right in the nature of salvage, shall be wholly inoperative (g). But if the agreement terminate prematurely, by reason of the wreck or loss of the ship, or if he be left on shore abroad under a certificate of illness or inability (h) to proceed, the seaman is only entitled to his wages for the time he has served.

Neglect or refusal to assist the master in his defence against pirates forfeits the wages (i), and a justifiable discharge for gross misconduct (such as habitual neglect of duty, constant drunkenness or disobedience (k)) entails a loss of them (l). In furtherance of this principle, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (m), provides, that a naval court (n), held under it on the high seas or abroad, who have jurisdiction over such offences, may discharge any seaman, and order his wages to be forfeited, and retained by the owner by way of compensation, or paid into the Exchequer.

According, also, to the doctrine of the common law, desertion from the ship forfeits the seaman's wages (o). The Merchant

Wages, how lost or forfeited.

Shipping Act, 1854, s. 243, as we have already seen (p), adopts the same principle; and in order to facilitate the enforcement of this forfeiture (q), renders his quitting the ship before the expiration of his engagement, with an entry of the fact of his desertion in the official log-book, sufficient primâ facie evidence to support the resistance to the claim of the sailor for his wages, and throws on him the onus of proving a proper discharge, or a sufficient excuse for his absence.

If the desertion take place abroad, the entry in the log ought to be produced to a public functionary, who is to endorse on the agreement a certificate of the desertion, and forward a certified copy of the entry in the log, and of the indorsement, to the Registrar-General of Seamen, and these documents are made evidence in any legal proceedings relating to the desertion (r).

Quitting the ship with leave of the master, and refusing to return when ordered, is desertion (s); but quitting the ship and refusing to proceed on a voyage not designated by the articles (t), or a voyage which would expose the seaman to greater risk than was contemplated when his agreement was entered into (u), is not so; nor is a man a deserter who has been compelled to quit the ship by inhuman treatment (x), or by want of provisions (y), or dismissed without lawful cause (z). So merely quitting the ship without leave, and going on shore for a temporary purpose, e. g., to obtain legal advice as to the effect of the articles, does not constitute desertion (a).

Geo. 3, c. 73, s. 1; 4 Geo. 4, c. 25, s. 9. These Acts were repealed by 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 19, and are only mentioned historically. The application of the common law as to desertion was not excluded by them: The Westmoreland, 1 W. Rob. Adm. Rep. 216; The Two Sisters, 2 W. Rob. Adm. Rep. 125.

Wages, how lost or forfeited.

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, in the terms already set forth (b), authorizes deductions to be made from the wages for various acts of misconduct, which may be determined in any proceeding instituted with respect to the wages (c). If, too, a seaman be dismissed during the voyage for gross misconduct other than desertion, he will lose all claim to accruing wages, as in the case of any other servant, but he will not forfeit those actually due (d).

Among the instances of misconduct for which deduction may be made, are embezzlement and injury to the ship or cargo. The penalty thus imposed is in accordance with the common law, by which it had been decided, that, if the cargo be embezzled or injured by the fraud or negligence of the seaman, the owner had a right to deduct a compensation from the wages of those whose misconduct had produced the injury (e); but he had no right to make any deduction on that account from the wages of the innocent (f).

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (g), likewise enacts, that—

"Whenever in any proceeding relating to seamen's wages, it is shown that any seaman or apprentice has in the course of the voyage been convicted of any offence by any competent tribunal, and rightly punished therefor by imprisonment or otherwise, the Court hearing the case may direct a part of the wages due to such seaman, not exceeding 3*l*., to be applied in reimbursing any costs

(b) 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 243, ante, pp. 536 et seq. By sect. 149, the agreement is to contain the regulations as to fines which the parties agree to adopt; sect. 256 provides how they are to be enforced and applied. As to the mode in which the amount of forfeiture is to be calculated, where the contract is by the voyage, run, or share, see sect. 252.

But where the seaman is engaged for a specific voyage by the month, as is usual, the question is more difficult: see Button v. Thompson, L. R. 4 C. P. 330; and the judgments of Dr. Lushington in The Blake (1 W. Rob. Adm. Rep. 73) and The Duchess of Kent (Ibid. 283).

properly incurred by the master in procuring such conviction and punishment."

Wages, how lost or forfeited.

An entry of any of these offences ought forthwith to be made in the official log, and signed by the master, and if he be in the ship, a copy should be furnished to the culprit, or it should be read over to him. An entry that this has been done, and of his answer, if any, should likewise be made; and in default of this being complied with, any Court subsequently hearing the case may refuse to receive evidence of the offence (h). A similar provision is contained (i) in the Act, as to the entries in the log and the communication of them in cases of misconduct, for which the agreement imposes a fine to be deducted from the wages, which fine is to be paid over to the superintendent.

By sect. 186, also, it is provided, that—

"No seaman or apprentice shall be entitled to wages for any period during which he unlawfully refuses or neglects to work when required, whether before or after the time fixed by the agreement for his beginning work, nor unless the Court hearing the case otherwise directs, for any period during which he is lawfully imprisoned for any offence committed by him."

Illness, death (k), and entering the Queen's service do not, as already stated (l), work a forfeiture of the seaman's wages. But by statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 124, s. 8, it is provided—

"Where a seaman is by reason of illness incapable of performing his duty, and it is proved that such illness has been caused by his own wilful act or default, he shall not be entitled to wages for the time during which he is by reason of such illness incapable of performing his duty."

Section IV.—Remedies of Seaman for his Wages.

Remedies of seaman for his wages.

It only remains to state the remedies which the law has provided for the recovery of seamen's wages.

As already stated, twenty-four hours before the discharge of any seaman, the master must deliver to him, or to the superintendent if he is to be discharged before him, an account of his wages, and all deductions, in a form approved by the Board of Trade (m). The time within which the wages are to be paid and the penalty imposed for any delay without sufficient cause, have been already mentioned (n). The superintendent before whom they are paid is also empowered to decide any question which the parties may agree by writing to submit to him (o); and, upon the final completion of the settlement, the master or owner and the seaman are to sign a mutual release of all claims, which is to be settled by the superintendent. This is conclusive, and in such cases no other evidence of a settlement is admitted (p).

Before the recent statutes, if the hiring had been on the usual terms, and made by words or by writing only, and not by deed, and their wages were unpaid, the seamen, or any one or more of them, and every officer, except the master (whatever was the amount of wages in dispute), might sue in the Court of Admiralty, and, by the process of that Court, arrest the ship as a security for the demand, or cite the master (q) or owners personally to answer them (r); and that, not only for the wages earned during the voyage, but for those earned in fitting the ship out, if the owners would not afterwards despatch it (s). This remedy still remains, and it is not confined to English subjects, but, generally speaking, is open to foreign seamen, whose claim is founded on the maritime law (t). Where the seamen thus proceed against the ship, their claim is preferred to all other charges on her (except salvage (u) and the maritime lien for damages arising out of damage done by a foreign vessel in a collision for which she is to blame (x)), since to their labour alone is her preservation and existence attributable (y). If the agreement were by deed, or contained special terms, the seamen's remedy was by action in the Courts of common law (z), which remedy was also open to them in cases where the Admiralty had jurisdiction, and it was the only one to which the master could, in general, have recourse, if he failed to reimburse himself, as he may, out of the ship's freight and earnings (a). But now, by sect. 10 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (b), claims by seamen for wages, whether they be due under a special contract or otherwise, and also claims by masters for their wages and disbursements on account of the ship, subject to the exceptions presently mentioned (c), may be preferred in the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice (d); provided that if less than 50*l.* is recovered, the plaintiff is not entitled to costs without a certificate from the judge (e). County Courts having Admiralty jurisdiction have jurisdiction over all claims for wages to the amount of 150*l.*, or to any amount if the parties agree (f). Whether the party sued in the Court of Admiralty or elsewhere, the proceeding must have been, and where available, must still be, commenced within six years, except in case of disability (g). either the master (h) or the owners; and, whenever it becomes necessary to produce the agreement in Court, it lies on them, not upon the seamen, to produce it (i).

Formerly the master, if he failed to reimburse himself, as he may, out of the ship's freight and earnings, had no remedy for his wages except in Courts of common law (k). But the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (l), provides that—

"Every master of a ship shall, so far as the case permits, have the same (m) rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages which by this Act, or by any law or custom, any seaman, not being a master, has for the recovery of his wages; and if in any proceeding in any Court of Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty touching the claim of a master to wages, any right of set-off or counter-claim is set up, it shall be lawful for such Court to enter into and adjudicate upon all questions, and to settle all accounts then arising or outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding, and to direct payment of any balance which is found to be due."

The Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (n), by sect. 10 enacts that the Admiralty Division (o) of the High Court shall have jurisdiction "over any claim by the master of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship." These provisions, it was once thought, gave the master a maritime lien on the ship and freight. The contrary having been decided by the House of Lords (p), it was expressly enacted by 52 & 53 Vict. c. 46, s. 1, that "every master of a ship, &c. shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens and remedies for the recovery of disbursements properly made by him on account of the ship, and for liabilities properly incurred by him on account of the ship, as a master now has for the recovery of his wages.

In the case of British and colonial ships, these remedies have been considerably qualified, and more summary proceedings substituted. The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, provides, by sect. 188, that—"Any seaman or apprentice, or any person duly authorised on his behalf, may sue in a summary manner before any two justices of the peace acting in or near to the place at which the service has terminated, or at which the seaman or apprentice has been discharged, or at which any person upon whom the claim is made is or resides, or in Scotland either before any such justices, or before the sheriff of the county within which any such place is situated, for any amount of wages due to such seaman or apprentice not exceeding 50*l.* over and above the costs of any proceeding for the recovery thereof, so soon as the same becomes payable; and every order made by such justices or sheriff in the matter shall be final."

And by sect. 189, that—

"No suit or proceeding for the recovery of wages under the sum of 50*l.* shall be instituted by or on behalf of any seaman or apprentice in any Court of Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty, or in the Court of Session in Scotland, or in any superior Court of Record in her Majesty's dominions (q), unless the owner of the ship is adjudged bankrupt or declared insolvent, or unless the ship is under arrest or is sold by the authority of any such Court as aforesaid, or unless any justices acting under the authority of this Act refer the case to be adjudged by such Court, or unless neither the owner nor master is or resides within twenty miles of the place where the seaman or apprentice is discharged or put ashore."

Though in terms confined to "any seaman or apprentice," these sections are applicable to the master also (r).

The right to sue in Courts abroad is also restricted in the following instances (s)—

"No seaman who is engaged for a voyage or engagement which is to terminate in the United Kingdom shall be entitled to sue in any Court abroad for wages, unless he is discharged with such sanction as herein required, and with the written consent of the master, or proves such ill-usage on the part of the master or by his authority as to warrant reasonable apprehension of danger to the life of such seaman, if he were to remain on board; but if any seaman on his return to the United Kingdom proves that the master or owner has been guilty of any conduct or default which, but for this enactment, would have entitled the seaman to sue for wages before the termination of the voyage or engagement, he shall be entitled to recover in addition to his wages such compensation, not exceeding twenty pounds, as the Court hearing the case thinks reasonable."

Upon any such proceeding (t)—

"Any question concerning the forfeiture of, or deductions from, the wages of any seaman or apprentice may be determined in any proceeding lawfully instituted with respect to such wages, notwithstanding that the offence in respect of which such question arises, though hereby made punishable by imprisonment as well as forfeiture, has not been made the subject of any criminal proceedings."

The Admiralty Division of the High Court may entertain the claims of seamen against foreign ships; but notice of the action must be sent to the consul of the country to which the ship belongs (u).

CHAPTER X.

APPRENTICESHIP.

Apprentice-ship.

THE contract of apprenticeship is, as its name denotes, a bargain for instruction (a) to be bestowed by one person upon another, who, in return, agrees to give up his whole time and services to his instructor, and frequently also to bestow upon him a pecuniary remuneration.

The relation which it creates is one of very ancient origin, and the reciprocal rights and duties which it involves greatly resemble those of parent and child; for the master is entitled to the whole produce of the labour of his apprentice (b), and may, in case of disobedience by the latter to his lawful commands, or upon the detection of any immorality in his behaviour, administer to him, if an infant, reasonable and wholesome corporal chastisement, such as a father may inflict upon his child, or a schoolmaster upon his pupil; the right to do so issuing in each case out of the patria potestas, the delegation of which has been, in all ages, allowed for the sake of the good government and education of young persons (c).

The state of the apprentice, however, differs from that of a school-boy in this material particular, viz., that an apprenticeship, being, at common law, looked upon as a contract between the master and the apprentice, could not have been created without the intervention of the latter (e). In the case of parish apprentices, this mutual consent is now, however, dispensed with, and the whole subject regulated by statutes, which will be found collected in the various treatises on poor laws (f).

The contract of apprenticeship is one of those by which a person under age is permitted by law to bind himself, upon that general ground adverted to by Lord Mansfield in Drury v. Drury (g), viz., "that if an agreement be for the benefit of an infant, it shall bind him" (h). He may indeed elect to avoid the agreement at his full age (i), or even while under age, if it be manifestly for his benefit so to do (k).

The stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4, created many regulations and restrictions respecting the mode of binding and the qualifications of apprentices; which being found extremely inconvenient in practice, it was, by 54 Geo. 3, c. 96, enacted, that any person may take or become an apprentice, though not according to the provisions of that Act, provided that the statute shall not prejudice the customs or by-laws of any corporation or company. The contract of binding must also, by the statute of Elizabeth, have been by deed indented (l). And though 54 Geo. 3, c. 96, has now dispensed with that formality, still, even under it, a writing is required, and a mere parol binding would not constitute an apprenticeship.

The binding is, however, even now, usually effected by deed (n), containing covenants by the master and apprentice for the faithful discharge of their respective duties towards each other. These covenants, whether entered into by the infant and master, or by the master and some other person, are generally (o) independent, and the performance of neither side is a condition precedent to that of the other (p). An infant may, as has been seen, bind himself an apprentice, yet no action will lie against him upon any covenants contained in the instrument by which he does so (q). The master is not, however, without remedy for the misbehaviour of his infant apprentice, since he may, as we have seen, correct him personally if he do amiss, taking care to use due moderation in the infliction of the punishment. He may also complain of him before justices of peace (r). A court of summary jurisdiction may, under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90), make an order directing the apprentice to perform his duties, and, in the event of non-compliance, order him to be imprisoned for a period not exceeding fourteen days (s. 6 (11)). It may also rescind the instrument of apprenticeship, ordering the whole or any part of the premium to be repaid. The master cannot, under this Act, enforce a deed of apprenticeship containing covenants not for the benefit of the apprentice, if an infant—e.g., a stipulation that the master need not pay wages during a "turn out" (s)—or maintain an action against any adult person who has covenanted for the good behaviour of the infant in the deed of apprenticeship (t); and the liability of such a person continues, though the infant should, on coming of age, elect to avoid the deed (u).

The apprentice, on his part, is entitled to have the covenants in the indentures duly performed towards him (v). And, even independently of the instrument of apprenticeship, the master may be sued, or, in a gross case of misconduct, even indicted, for ill-usage and neglect of him (w). By 14 & 15 Vict. c. 11, s. 1, the master wilfully neglecting to provide necessary food, clothing, or lodging, when bound to do so, or maliciously assaulting the apprentice, whereby his life is endangered, or it is likely his health may be permanently injured, may be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three years (x). It would be murder in him were he to suffer an apprentice of tender years to suffer for want of food.

An apprentice, though absent from work during a temporary illness, is yet entitled to any wages provided by the deed of apprenticeship to be paid (y).

The apprenticeship may be determined by consent of parties; provided, if the apprentice be under age, that the dissolution be for his advantage (z), and provided the indentures, if any, be got rid of (a); or by an infant's election at his full age (b); or by the master's bankruptcy (c); or by the death of the master (d), or the death or permanent illness of the apprentice (e); or by the intervention of the court of quarter sessions; or a county court judge; or a stipendiary magistrate; or justices (f). The tribunals have the power either of making an order directing the apprentice to perform his duties, or they may rescind the instrument of apprenticeship, and order the return of the whole or any part of the premium (g), upon complaint, founded on just grounds, of either the master or apprentice.

It is necessary, before leaving this subject, to say a few words upon what is called the assignment of an apprentice. A master cannot assign an apprentice without the consent of the latter (h). And though, by the consent of all parties, the services of the apprentice may be transferred, yet, in the generality of cases, this operates as an agreement between the master and the transferee that the apprentice shall, with his own consent, perform his contract to the former by doing service to the latter (i). By the custom of London, indeed, an assignment, properly so called, of an apprentice, may be made by one freeman to another (k), so as to transfer the benefit of the covenants to the assignee.

An apprentice bound to serve a firm, W. E., their partners and successors, is not bound to serve when the firm is dissolved and part of the business is carried on at L. by two of the partners, and part at D. by other two. There is an implied condition in indentures of apprenticeship that the contract is to be performed at the place where the business was carried on when the contract (l) was concluded. "There is a broad distinction between this case and that of an apprentice taken into the house. In the latter case, I am inclined to think that the master would be entitled to take the apprentice with him if he removed to another place, and that it would be beyond the

3. Surety, how discharged.
4. Surety, how indemnified.
5. Representations in the Nature of Guaranties.

SECTION I.—Nature and Form of Contract (a).

Nature and form of contract.

A GUARANTY is a promise to answer for the payment of some debt, or the performance of some duty, in case of the failure of another person, who is himself, in the first instance, liable to such payment or performance (b). A mere offer to guarantee is

(a) As disputes are frequently occasioned by the inartificial wording of guaranties, the following general form, which may be safely adopted in any case, may, it is thought, be useful:—

London, the — day of —, 18—.

In consideration that Mr. C. D. will at my request (or, "has at my request")—[here state the consideration for which the guaranty is given], I do hereby guarantee to him the said Mr. C. D. [here state the sum or thing guaranteed]. This guaranty is to continue in force for the period of [state period if agreed on] and no longer.

Witness my hand, A. B.

(b) Fell on Guaranties, p. 1. Probably the following is a better definition: "A contract of guaranty is an express contract between the surety (the person who gives the guaranty) and the creditor (the person to whom the guaranty is given) to perform the promise or discharge the liability, actually incurred, or in contemplation, of a third person called the principal debtor, in case of his not performing the promise or discharging the liability." See De Colyar on Guaranties, p. 54, 2nd ed.; Imperial Bank v. London and St. Katherine Dock Co., 5 Ch. D., per Jessel, M. R., at p. 200. The definition in the Indian Contract Code, s. 126, is as follows:—"A contract of guaranty is a contract to perform the promise or discharge the liability of a third person in case insufficient until accepted (c). But if the guaranty be given at the request of the person to whom it is given, no notice of acceptance by him is necessary (d).

Nature and form of contract.

By stat. 29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 4—

"No action shall be brought whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriages of another person, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised."

This section prevents a verbal guaranty from being sued upon (e). It is to be observed, however, that verbal guaranties are not void. Thus, if money have been paid in pursuance of it, the money cannot be recovered back (f). Though no action can be brought upon a guaranty which does not satisfy the provisions of the statute, yet the Court will enforce it against an attorney who has undertaken to pay his client's debt and costs, by virtue of their summary jurisdiction over their own officers (g). If a party admit that he has made a binding guaranty, by paying money into Court on a claim charging him with it, that renders proof of a written instrument unnecessary (h); but it is otherwise if he do an act which merely admits that an agreement was made, without admitting that such a one was made as would be binding under the statute (i).

of his default." This does not emphasise the fact that the contract must be express. The definitions must vary according as it applies or not to a guaranty within the meaning of the Statute of Frauds.

Nature and form of contract.

A del credere contract is not a guaranty within the Statute of Frauds. The authorities are not at one as to the reason for the exclusion of such contracts. That given by Parke, B., in Couturier v. Hastie (k) is:—

"If they (the agents) had for a percentage guaranteed the debt owing, or performance of the contract by the vendee, being totally unconnected with the sale, they would not be liable, without a note in writing signed by them; but being the agents to negotiate the sale, the commission is paid in respect of that employment; a higher reward is paid in consideration of their taking greater care in sales to their customers, and precluding all question whether the loss arose from negligence or not, and also for assuming a greater share of responsibility than ordinary agents, namely, responsibility for the solvency and performance of their contracts by their vendees. This is the main object of the reward; and though it may terminate in a liability to pay the debt of another, that is not the immediate object for which the consideration is given" (l).

It has been held that the statute applies, although the action be not brought upon the parol agreement, provided the effect of allowing it to be maintained would be to charge the defendant thereby (n). But when a person, sued upon his acceptance, pleaded that it was for the plaintiff's own accommodation, he was allowed to show that it was discounted to raise money which the plaintiff had undertaken to pay pursuant to a verbal guaranty (o).

As conformity to the provisions of the statute is thus requisite, it will be proper to consider them separately.

(k) 8 Ex. at p. 55.

(l) That the law is as stated in the text is clear. But the above reasons are unsatisfactory. In Wickham v. Wickham (2 K. & J. 478) Wood, V.-C., suggests that the judges in Couturier v. Hastie, supra, thought that the agreement "was not a simple guaranty, but a distinct and positive undertaking on his part on which he would become primarily liable; otherwise, I cannot see how the learned judges could arrive at the conclusion that the undertaking was not within the Statute of Frauds." The del credere agent is not primarily liable. See ante, p. 128.

Nature and form of contract.

No action shall be brought, to charge the defendant, upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another.—In order that a contract may fall within these terms, it is essential that it should be for the payment or performance of something for which another person is liable, or will, in the contemplation of the parties, become liable. "There can be no suretyship," said Lord Selborne in Lakeman v. Mountstephen (p), "unless there be a principal debtor, who, of course, may be constituted in the course of the transaction by matters ex post facto, and need not be so at the time; but until there is a principal debtor there can be no suretyship. Nor can a man guarantee anybody else's debt unless there is a debt of some other person to be guaranteed." For instance, where A., in consideration that B. would not sue J. S., promised to pay the money due from J. S., this was held to be within the statute (q); for J. S. was liable to the payment of his debt before and after A.'s promise, which therefore was, strictly, "to answer for the debt of J. S." But, where it was agreed between A., his creditors, and one J. S., that J. S. should pay the creditors ten shillings in the pound, to be received by them in full satisfaction, and that they should assign their debts to J. S., this contract was held not within the statute, because J. S. had not contracted to pay the debts of A., but to purchase them from A.'s creditors, and would, after such purchase, have a right to use the names of the creditors, in order to recover the debts from A. (r). The original liability must not be extinguished. Thus, where the defendant, in consideration that the plaintiff would discharge out of custody a person whom he had taken on a ca. sa., promised to pay the debt on a certain day, or render that person, the Court held the promise not within the statute, because the debt was gone by the discharge of the debtor out of custody (s). In Thomas v. Cook (t) it was laid down that a promise to indemnify was not within the statute, and this seems generally to be the better opinion.

A transfer to a creditor of a debt due to the debtor from a third person is not within the statute. Thus, if C. be A.'s debtor, and B.'s creditor, an agreement by B. to pay his debt to A. in discharge of C.'s liability is not within the statute (u). But, quære, if the debt from B. to C. had been contingent at the time of making such agreement (x).

A promise to pay another man's debt out of that other man's own funds, when they shall come to the hands of the person promising, or out of certain funds to be received by him, is not within the statute (y). In such a case no third person is answerable for the promise.

The promise must be made to the creditor. The Court of Queen's Bench decided, in Eastwood v. Kenyon (z), that if A. promise B. that he (A.) will pay to C. a debt due to C. from B., that promise is not within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, and, consequently, need not be reduced to writing. The Court further stated its opinion that the statute applies only to promises made to the person to whom another is answerable (a); and this opinion has been since confirmed and acted

(a) In a note to the original and subsequent editions, doubts are cast on the accuracy of Eastwood v. Kenyon, for the following among other reasons:—(1) because promises, such upon by the Courts of Exchequer (b), Common Pleas (c), and by Malins, V.-C., in Wildes v. Dudlow (d).

A distinction was once taken between a promise to pay for goods, &c., for another, before and after delivery (e); but this is overruled, and it is now clear that, if the person for whose use the goods are furnished is liable at all, any promise by a third person, on sufficient consideration, to pay that debt must be in writing (f). In a word, the question by which it must be tested, whether a contract be or be not within the statute, is, What is the promise? Is it a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, for which that other remains liable? If so, it must be in writing (g).

The reader must, however, be apprised, that it has been thought to follow from some of the decisions (h), that a man may bind himself to pay another's debt by a parol promise founded on a new consideration. This idea has been contro-as the promise in that case, may be as complex, and the length of time that is to precede their accomplishment as great, as in the case of an ordinary guaranty, and they may, therefore, equally need written evidence; (2) because cases may be put in which these promises would become, in effect, guaranties; e.g., where the promise is made to the debtor, or the stranger as trustee for the creditor, or where the debtor or stranger afterwards assign to the creditor; and (3) because the opinion expressed in Eastwood v. Kenyon appears to diverge from Green v. Cresswell, 10 Ad. & E. 453. It is, however, observed: "In making these observations, however, it is intended only to suggest the possibility of a discussion which may hereafter arise, not to impugn the proposition cited from Eastwood v. Kenyon, which indeed must ultimately be sustained if the meaning of the words, promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, be taken, as they well may, to refer to a promise to become a substitute to every intent for that other—to answer to the same call to which he would have answered under pain of the same liability." verted, and the cases explained, and reconciled to the rule as above stated, in an elaborate note, 1 Wms. Saund. 211*c*, n. 1; where it is contended, that the nature of the consideration cannot affect the terms of the promise itself, unless, as in Goodman v. Chase (i), it be an extinguishment of the liability of the original party. In the cases referred to, there was no principal debtor; and, indeed, in Edwards v. Kelly, cited above, the judges all professed to decide, on the ground that the promise there was not to pay the debt of another (k). Nature and form of contract.

Where A. has been concerned in inducing a tradesman to deliver goods to B., it often becomes a question whether the goods must be looked upon as actually sold to A., though delivered to B., or whether they must be considered as sold to B., A. becoming a surety for the price. In the former case, A. would be liable as a principal, and the contract would not fall within the statute. In the latter, A. would be liable only as surety, and only on a written guaranty. To decide this question, to whom was credit given? is, generally speaking (l), the province of a jury, who are to take into their consideration all the circumstances of the case (m). If, upon notice given to the plaintiff to produce his books, it appear that the credit was not originally given to A., that is strong, though not conclusive, evidence that he is but a surety (n).

It has been laid down, that a verbal promise to pay the debt of another, and also do some other thing, is void altogether (o). This seems, however, to hold good in those cases only in which the parts of the contract are so blended together that they cannot be separated (p).

(k) The debt of the principal debtor was suspended. The cases (Edwards v. Kelly, Williams v. Leaper, Bampton v. Paulin, supra) are not easily reconcilable. It has been suggested that they are examples of the rule that to bring a promise within the statute there must be an absence of all liability on the part of the promisor, except such as arises from express promise: Fitzgerald v. Dressler, 7 C. B. N. S. 374; De Colyar on Guarantees, 2nd ed. p. 116.

Unless the agreement, &c.—The term agreement comprehends contracting parties (q), a consideration, and a promise; and it was held, that not only must all these exist in fact, but they must appear in the writing (r). It was, however, sufficient if the consideration could be gathered from the whole tenor of the writing; not that a mere conjecture, however plausible, would satisfy the statute, but it was enough if there was a well-grounded inference to be necessarily collected from the terms of the memorandum (s). This rule, requiring parties to express in the terms of a popular instrument, rarely prepared under professional advice, a consideration which the law would recognise as sufficient to support a promise—gave rise to numberless questions. Many of these involved most subtle and refined distinctions, and justice and right were constantly defeated by technical objections, in consequence of the defective form of the instrument, though the facts would have supported it. In order to obviate such results, the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (t), provided that:—

"No special promise to be made by any person, after the passing of this Act, to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, being in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person by him thereunto lawfully authorised, shall be deemed invalid to support an action, suit, or other proceeding to charge the person by whom such promise shall have been made, by reason only that the consideration for such promise does not appear in writing, or by necessary inference from a written document."

Nature and form of contract.

This provision applies only to guaranties given after the passing of the Act (u), and, therefore, all instruments executed before that time remain subject to the same objections, and must be interpreted by the same rules as formerly prevailed. The necessity of the actual existence of a consideration, sufficient in law to support a promise (x), is not dispensed with, but its existence is left open to oral proof. If, therefore, it be questioned, the person asserting a claim under a guaranty must show that it was based on a good legal consideration, which, as a practical rule (y), may be said to consist of any benefit accruing to him who makes the promise, or any loss, trouble, or disadvantage undergone by, or charge imposed upon him to whom it is made. A consideration, consequently, wholly past or executed will not support the promise; thus, if A. be indebted to B., this will form no valid consideration for C.'s afterwards promising to pay that debt (z); the creditor yields nothing, nor does C. gain any advantage. But if an executed consideration has been moved at the request of the promisor, the case will be different. For instance, if B. had trusted A. at the instance or request of C., his promise to pay it couples itself with that antecedent request (a), which induced him to allow it to be contracted, and will be supported by it. The consideration for a guaranty must also, according to some cases, be of some (b) value in contemplation of law. But if this proposition means more than that, there must be a consideration, it is incorrect; all that is requisite is the existence of some consideration; for the Courts will not entertain the question of its adequacy (c), a question which the parties must be taken, in the absence of fraud, to have decided for themselves. A guaranty, therefore, to pay a debt in consideration of the creditor giving his debtor a certain (d) time for payment, however short, or to pay a past debt, however large, as well as any future debt, in consideration of the creditor continuing his transactions or giving further credit to any amount, will be binding. And this will be the case, though the guaranty is simply conditional, and the creditor does not enter into any binding engagement to continue the transactions or give further credit, if the creditor subsequently satisfies the condition (e). Thus, in one case (f), the creditor, having bonâ fide continued his dealings with the principal debtors, the following guaranty was held to be an available security for the antecedent as well as the subsequent debt:—

"As you are about to enter upon transactions in business with Messrs. Claridge, Brothers, & Nicholls, with whom you have already had dealings, in the course of which they may from time to time become largely indebted to you: in consideration of your doing so, I agree to be responsible to you for, and guarantee to you the payment of, any sums of money which that firm—whether it may consist of the same members as at present or others—now is or may at any time be indebted to you, so that I am not called on to pay more than the sum of 2,000*l.*" (g).

Nature and form of contract.

(to use the words of Tindal, C. J., in Laythoarp v. Bryant (o)), there is "no case, nor any reason for saying that the signature of both parties is that which makes the agreement. The agreement is in fact made before any signature." Both parties must, it is true, have concurred in making the agreement; but the statute only requires that one, viz., the party to be charged, should sign the document that is evidence to it. A letter of guarantee to a bank, signed in the name of the firm, and also by the individual partners, was held to create joint and several liability (p).

In consequence of the decision in Pasley v. Freeman (q), which showed a mode of evading the 4th section by bringing an action in tort for deceit, alleging a false and fraudulent representation by the defendant with respect to the solvency of the third person, and that credit was given by the plaintiff on the faith of the representation, the 6th section of Lord Tenterden's Act (9 Geo. 4, c. 14) was passed. It declares that—

"No action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon or by reason of any representation or assurance made or given concerning or relating to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings of any other person to the intent or purpose that such other person may obtain credit, money, or goods upon,* unless such representation or assurance be made in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith."

The signature of an agent will not satisfy the statute (r).

The law merchant implies a contract of suretyship between the drawer and indorsee, and between indorsers and subsequent holders, of bills of exchange (s).

It is, in some cases, necessary that a guaranty should be stamped. The stat. 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, imposes a stamp duty of 6*d.* on agreements, the subject-matter whereof is of the value of 5*l.* and upwards, not otherwise charged. To this there are, however, some exceptions, particularly of agreements for the sale of goods. Contracts of guaranty are within the Act. Where the principal contract would require a stamp, so does the guaranty, and vice versâ (t). Nature and form of contract.

Section II.—Surety, when and how far liable.

The creditor is not bound by English law to sue the debtor before suing the surety (u). Nor, in the absence of express stipulation, is he even required to give notice to the surety of the debtor's default. The surety, however, is entitled to have his liability proved in the same way as the liability of the principal debtor; so that, if there be no special agreement to that effect, a judgment or award against the principal debtor is not binding on the surety, and is not evidence against him (x). Surety, when and how far liable.

The extent of the surety's liability depends, of course, on the peculiar construction of each guaranty. A contract to guarantee the payment of "any debt A. B. may contract in his business as jeweller, not exceeding one hundred pounds, after this date," is a contract which renders the guarantor answerable for any debts, not exceeding 100*l.*, which A. B. may, from time to time, contract in the way of his business (y). Such a contract is called a continuing guaranty. Disputes frequently arise, whether an instrument falls within this description or not. The best rule on the subject seems to be that laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Merle v. Wells (z), viz., that "if a party means to be surety only for a single dealing, he should take care to say so" (a).

Surety, when and how far liable.

In fact, the contract of guaranty "should," as was said by Martin, B., in Wood v. Priestner (b), "be read in the same way as any other contract," and must be construed with regard to the whole of the surrounding circumstances. In Heffield v. Meadows (c) the guaranty was: "I, J. M., will be answerable for 50*l.* that W. T., butcher, may buy of I. H." Willes, J., in deciding that this was a continuing guaranty said:—

"It is obvious that we cannot decide that question, upon the mere construction of the document itself, without looking at the surrounding circumstances to see what was the subject-matter which the parties had in their contemplation when the guaranty pressed itself averse to extending the rule of construction against guarantors. And see Heffield v. Meadows, L. R. 4 C. P. 595; Hitchcock v. Humfrey, 5 M. & G. 559; Martin v. Wright, 6 Q. B. 917; Coles v. Pack, L. R. 5 C. P. 65; Nottingham Hide Co. v. Bottrill, L. R. 8 C. P. 694; Burgess v. Eve, L. R. 13 Eq. 450. The decisions run very close, ex. gr., Nicholson v. Paget, supra: —"I hereby agree to be answerable for the payment of 50*l. for F. L., in case F. L. does not pay for the gin, &c., he receives from you:*"—Held not a continuing guaranty; Allnutt v. Ashenden, 5 M. & G. 392:—

"Sittingbourne, April 14, 1838."

Held not to be a continuing guaranty. But see Mason v. Pritchard, 12 East, 227; and Horlor v. Carpenter, 3 C. B. N. S. 172. In Hargreave v. Smee, 6 Bing. 244, the Court thought that the ordinary rule, verba fortius accipiuntur contra proferentem, applied to these as to other instruments. In Wood v. Priestner, L. R. 2 Ex. 66, 282, a guaranty: "In consideration of the credit given by H. Co. to my son for coal supplied by them to him, I hereby hold myself responsible as a guarantee to them for the sum of 100*l., and in default of payment of any accounts due, I bind myself by this note to pay to H. Co. whatever may be owing to an amount not exceeding* 100*l.*:" was held by the Courts of Exchequer and Exchequer Chamber a continuing guaranty. In Laurie v. Scholefield, L. R. 4 C. P. 622, the guaranty was: "In consideration of the Union Bank agreeing to advance, and advancing, to R. & Co. any sum or sums of money they may require, during the next eighteen months, not exceeding in the whole 1,000*l.*, we hereby, jointly and severally, guarantee the payment of any such sum as may be owing to the bank at the expiration of the said period of eighteen months." This was held to be a continuing guaranty. In Morrell v. Cowan, 7 Ch. D. 151, the guaranty was as follows: "In consideration of you, the said G. M., having at my request agreed to supply and furnish goods to M. M. C., I hereby guarantee to you, the said G. M., the sum of 500*l.* This guaranty is to continue in force for the period of six years and no longer." Reversing the decision of the Court below, the Court of Appeal held that this was limited to goods supplied after the guaranty.

was given. It is proper to ascertain that, for the purpose of seeing what the parties were dealing about, not for the purpose of altering the terms of the guaranty by words of mouth passing at the time, but as part of the conduct of the parties, in order to determine what was the scope and object of the intended guaranty. Having done that, it will be proper to turn to the language of the guaranty to see if that language is capable of being construed so as to carry into effect that which appears to have been really the intention of both parties" (d).

In Simpson v. Manley (e), it was held by the Court of Exchequer, that the words, "if you give A. credit, we will be responsible," were not equivalent to saying, "if you give him the credit usual in your trade," viz., that of grocers. In Combe v. Woolfe (f), the guaranty was—

"Messrs C. D. & Co.

"I hereby guarantee and engage to see you paid for any porter that you may send Mr. A. B. of this town, until you receive notice to the contrary from me.

The custom of the plaintiffs was to give six months' credit, and then sometimes to take a bill at two; the plaintiffs having given A. B. eleven months' credit, it was held, that they thereby discharged the surety.

In Holland v. Teed (g) the guaranty was given to a banking house consisting of several partners for the repayment of bills drawn upon them by one of their customers at any advances to be made from time to time to the firm of C. & Co., "to continue in force for one year from the date hereof." Wigram, V.-C., decided that the guaranty ceased at the death of one of the partners before the expiration of the year.

For the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties, the Courts look to the extrinsic or surrounding circumstances. Thus, in Leathley v. Spyer (h), two persons gave to the committee of Lloyd's a guaranty for any debt that "J. S. may contract in his capacity of broker." Read literally, it was a guaranty for the acts of J. S. But read in the light of the course of business, the guaranty was construed to extend to the debts of H., whom J. S. had appointed his substitute (f).

Questions often arise (g) as to whether a guaranty given to or for a firm continues in force after a change in its constitution. In order to lay down a definite rule upon this point, the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (h) provides that—

"No promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, made to a firm consisting of two or more persons, or to a single person trading under the name of a firm, and no promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of a firm consisting of two or more persons or of a single person trading under the name of a firm, shall be binding on the person making such promise in respect of anything done or omitted to be done after a change shall have taken place in any one or more of the persons constituting the firm, or in the person trading under the name of the firm, unless the intention of the parties that such promise shall continue to be binding, notwithstanding such change, shall appear either by express stipulation or by necessary implication from the nature of the firm or otherwise."

This provision merely expressed the then existing rule of construction (i).

rights, even though his position is improved (p), or which would render a proceeding against the surety a fraud upon the principal, he discharges the surety. For instance, if he agree (i.e., enter into a binding contract (q)) with the principal debtor to give him time; for then, if he forbear proceeding during the time given, he wrongs the surety by prolonging his responsibility. While, on the other hand, if he proceed against the surety, he gives him a remedy over against the principal, and thus exposes the latter to proceedings, contrary to the faith of his agreement (r). So, if he substitute a new agreement instead of that for the performance of which the surety was responsible (s), or the duties of the principal be so altered as materially to affect the peril of the surety (t); or, it has been said, if the principal be guilty of gross laches whereby a security to which the surety on paying the debt would be entitled is lost (u); or, if there has been connivance amounting to fraud (x).

ance (a), unless, indeed, there be some stipulation in the guaranty binding the party guaranteed to use due diligence against the principal (b), nor by acceptance of a collateral security (c), nor if he himself have agreed to the indulgence given the principal (d), or have subsequently assented to it (e). And the surety will not be discharged, even where the creditor has altogether released and discharged the principal, if the surety have expressly consented to remain liable (f), or if, though the principal is discharged or time is given to him by the creditor, there is a reservation of the creditor's rights against the surety (g).

The question of what alterations in a contract will release the surety was considered by the Court of Appeal in the recent case of Holme v. Brunskill (h). There the plaintiff had agreed to let a farm of about 234 acres, with a right of pasturing sheep on the commons and fields adjoining, and a flock of 700 sheep to G. B. as yearly tenant. And the defendant entered into a bond for the due delivery by G. B. at the determination of the tenancy of the like number, species, and quality of good and sound sheep. Afterwards the plaintiff entered into an agreement with G. B., his tenant, by which the latter surrendered one field, and the former reduced the rent by 10*l*. In an action against the surety in consequence of the flock of sheep having been delivered by G. B. at the determination of his tenancy reduced in number and deteriorated in value and quality, Denman, J., at the trial, left it to the jury to say whether the new agreement made any substantial or material difference in the relation of the parties as regards the capacity to do the things mentioned in the bond, and for which the action was brought. The jury answered in the negative, and assessed the damages at 132*l*. Upon appeal, Cotton, L. J., delivering the judgment of Thesiger, L. J., and himself (Brett, L. J., dissenting), thus stated the rule :—

"Sect. 134. The surety is discharged by any contract between the creditor and the principal debtor, by which the principal debtor is released, or by any act or omission of the creditor, the legal consequence of which is the discharge of the principal debtor.

"Sect. 135. A contract between the creditor and the principal debtor, by which the creditor makes a composition with, or promises to give time to, or not to sue, the principal debtor, discharges the surety, unless the surety assents to such contract."

"The true rule in my opinion is, that if there is any agreement between the principals with reference to the contract guaranteed, the surety ought to be consulted, and that if he has not consented to the alteration, although in cases where it is without inquiry evident that the alteration is unsubstantial, or that it cannot be otherwise than beneficial to the surety, the surety may not be discharged, yet that, if it is not self-evident that the alteration is unsubstantial, or one which cannot be prejudicial to the surety, the Court will not, in an action against the surety, go into an inquiry as to the effect of the alteration, or allow the question, whether the surety is discharged or not, to be determined by the finding of a jury as to the materiality of the alteration, or on the question whether it is to the prejudice of the surety, but will hold that in such a case the surety himself must be the sole judge whether or not he will consent to remain liable notwithstanding the alteration, and that if he has not so consented he will be discharged. This is in accordance with what is stated to be the law by Amphlett, L. J., in the Croydon Gas Company v. Dickenson" (i).

In the latter case (j), Bramwell, L. J., says: "There are three ways in which the surety might be discharged. First, by time being given to the debtor; secondly, by an alteration in the contract between the principals (i.e., the principal and the creditor); and thirdly, by the principals dealing together so as to affect the position of the surety to his prejudice."

The Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (k), specially provides, by s. 30, sub-s. 4, that an order of discharge of a bankrupt under that Act shall not release any person who, at the date of the receiving order, was surety, or in the nature of a surety, for him; and by s. 18, sub-s. 15, it is provided that "the acceptance by a creditor of a composition or scheme shall not release any person who under this Act would not be released by an order of discharge if the debtor had been adjudged bankrupt" (i); and a surety for the payment of rent under a lease to the principal will not be discharged by a disclaimer of the lease by the principal's trustee in bankruptcy (k).

If the creditor omit to perform any condition, express or implied, imposed upon him by the guaranty, the surety will of course not be liable (l). And fraud—for instance, the concealment of some material part of the principal's contract from the surety—vitiates and avoids his engagement (m).

"The principle to be drawn from the cases," said Tindal, C. J., delivering the judgment of the Court in Stone v. Compton (n), "we take to be this; that if, with the knowledge or assent of the creditor, any material part of the transaction between the creditor and his debtor is misrepresented to the surety, the misrepresentation being such that, but for the same having taken place, either the suretyship would not have been entered into at all, or, being entered into, the extent of the surety's liability might be thereby increased, the security so given is void at law on the ground of fraud."

The death of the surety does not affect the liability of his estate in respect of credit already given to the principal. Where, however, a surety, who has given a continuing guaranty, dies, and notice of his death is given to the creditor by the surety's executor, the executor will not be responsible for any liability incurred by the principal after the notice where the surety himself, if living, could have put an end to the guaranty (p).

Generally, a continuing guaranty, unless containing an express stipulation to the contrary, is revocable by the surety (q). But the nature of the transaction may show that the guaranty is not revocable. This would be so in cases where a relationship of contract is established between the principal and the creditor, and the surety gives the guaranty for the principal in that relationship, e.g., where a guaranty is given for the performance by a tenant of the covenants in a lease granted to him, and the relationship of landlord and tenant is established on the faith of the guaranty. In these cases the guaranty is not revocable by the surety, and his executor is liable upon it after the surety's death (r).

If there are two or more sureties, the release of one discharges the others in all cases where the obligation of the co-sureties is joint or joint and several, for there the joint suretyship of the others is part of the consideration for the contract of each (s). Not so where the sureties are bound severally only, and the suretyship of the one is no part of the contract of the others, except in cases where, and to the extent to which, the right of contribution (a right which will be presently explained (t)) is thereby lost to the others (u).

It has been held that the death of a co-surety under a joint and several continuing guaranty does not by itself release the others from liability for future advances (y).

If a guaranty has been altered in a material particular while in the creditor's hands, without the consent of the guarantor, it becomes void (z).

Generally speaking, too, any matter which would operate in favour of the principal as an answer to, or in reduction of, the debt, e.g., a set off, &c., may be taken advantage of by the surety (a). The surety will be discharged pro tanto if the creditor loses or parts with any security to which the former would have been entitled (b), and he is entitled to credit for sums received by the creditor under the bankruptcy of the debtor (c).

It has been decided that a continuing guaranty for advances is countermandable by parol (cc).

he may obtain reimbursement (f), and may sue toties quoties he is compelled to make a payment on account of it (g). He also has a right, which formerly was a right in equity only, to have any fund, which was charged with the principal debt, applied for his indemnification (h), and to have all the securities taken by the creditor preserved for him (i). This right extends to securities unknown to the surety and to those acquired after the contract of suretyship was entered into (k).

The Mercantile Law Amendment Act (l) expressly provides that—

"Every person who, being surety for the debt or duty of another, or being liable with another for any debt or duty, shall pay such debt or perform such duty, shall be entitled to have assigned to him, or to a trustee for him, every judgment, specialty, or other security which shall be held by the creditor in respect of such debt or duty, whether such judgment, specialty, or other security shall or shall not be deemed at law to have been satisfied by the payment of the debt or performance of the duty, and such person shall be entitled to stand in the place of the creditor, and to use all the remedies, and, if need be, and upon a proper indemnity, to use the name of the creditor, in any action or other proceeding, at law or in equity, in order to obtain from the principal debtor, or any co-surety, co-contractor, or co-debtor, as the case may be, indemnification for the advances made and loss sustained by the person who shall have so paid such debt or performed such duty, and such payment or performance so made by such surety shall not be pleadable in bar of any such action or other proceeding by him: Provided always, that no co-surety, co-contractor, or co-debtor, shall be entitled to recover from any other co-surety, co-contractor, or co-debtor, by the means aforesaid, more than the just proportion to which, as between those parties themselves, such last-mentioned person shall be justly liable."

It appears that, even if the surety were under a disability which prevented him from obtaining, in his own person, the benefit of securities which had been set apart for the creditor, equity would have restrained the creditor from proceeding against the surety till he had resorted to those securities (m). And where the principal has assigned his effects to a trustee for his creditors, a creditor who has a guaranty may be forced to apply in discharge thereof a rateable part of any payment he may receive from the trustee (n). This obligation does not always exist. In cases where the amount of the guaranty is less than the amount of the principal's indebtedness, the Court, in a review, in Ellis v. Emmanuel (o), of the authorities, showed that the question depends on whether the intention was to guarantee the whole debt or to guarantee a part only. Primâ facie a guaranty for a floating balance is merely for a proportionate part of the debt; but whether the guaranty is for the whole debt or a part only is a question of construction for the Court (p).

In some respects the surety may stand in a better position than the creditor. If, for instance, the creditor of a firm were to obtain judgment against one partner he could not, according to Kendall v. Hamilton (q), sue another partner. This rule, it would appear, does not take away the rights of a surety for one partner as against another partner (r).

As the surety has a right to reimbursement from his principal in toto, so he has from his co-sureties for the same debt or duty (s) pro tanto, whether they are so under the same or separate instruments (t). This latter right is called the right to contribution, and was recognised both in law and equity (u), with this distinction, that at law a surety was, in every case, entitled to contribution from his co-sureties, in proportion to their number, without regard to the insolvency of any one of them, which equity, on the contrary, regarded. Thus, if A., B., and C. were co-sureties, A., having paid the debt, was entitled to recover, at law, a third only from B., though C. might have become insolvent (v); whereas, in equity, he was entitled to one half (x). But, both in law and equity, if he had been reimbursed in part, the contribution must be calculated by the residue (y). This distinction is now obsolete; the Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), ss. 24 and 25 (11), having enacted that in case of a conflict or variance between the rules of law and equity, the latter shall prevail. It is said that, where one surety becomes so at the instance of another, the latter cannot call on him for contribution (z).

We have seen that the surety's right to reimbursement from his principal accrues toties quoties he is compelled to make a payment. With regard to his right to contribution, it is different; for until one has paid more than his proportion, either of the whole debt or of the part which remains due from his principal, it is not clear that he ever will be entitled to demand anything from the other; and, before that, he has no equity to receive a contribution, and consequently no right of action, which is founded on the equity to receive it. Thus, if the surety, more than six years before the action, have paid a portion of the debt, and the principal has paid the residue within six years, the Statute of Limitations will not run from the payment by the surety, but from the payment of the residue by the principal; for, until the latter date, it does not appear that the surety has paid more than his share. The practical advantage of this rule is considerable, as it would tend to a multiplicity of suits, and to a great inconvenience, if each surety might sue the others for a rateable proportion of what he has paid the instant he had paid any part of the debt. But whenever it appears that one has paid more than his proportion of what the sureties can ever be called upon to pay, then, and not till then, it is also clear that such part ought to be repaid by the others, and the action will lie for it (a). As soon, too, as a surety has paid the original debt or performed the stipulated duty (b), he has a right to have any judgment, specialty, or security held by the original creditor transferred to him, and notwithstanding such payment or performance might otherwise be deemed at law to have satisfied it, to obtain through the medium of it a just proportion of his loss from any co-surety, co-contractor, or co-debtor, who is precluded from pleading the payment or performance as an answer.

The right to contribution equally exists whether the sureties were engaged jointly or severally, in one instrument or in several instruments, and whether they knew of each other's engagements or not; for, in all these cases alike, a payment by one is a benefit to all (c). But any surety may, of course, by using words to that effect, so modify his contract that he will be liable only on the default of previous sureties, who will then be entitled to no contribution from him (d). Surety, how indemnified.

Not only are sureties entitled to contribution among each other, they are entitled to the benefit of securities which one of them has taken to indemnify himself; and it matters not that the others were ignorant when they entered into the contract of the existence of them (e). "Whatever," said Fry, J., "goes to diminish the total amount of the burden must, in my judgment, be brought into hotchpot" (f).

The indorser of a bill of exchange who has paid the holder is entitled to recover over against the acceptor, and the relationship between the indorser and acceptor is sometimes described as that of suretyship; the acceptor is considered the principal and the indorsers as sureties, and the indorser who has paid will be entitled to any securities deposited with the holder by the acceptor (g).

This chapter would be hardly complete if we were to take no notice of certain representations which have very much the same effect as guaranties, and for some time materially interfered with the operation of the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds. In consequence of the case of Pasley v. Freeman (h) (where such an action was decided to be maintainable), it became the practice to bring actions in which parties were charged, not strictly as guarantees for others, in which case the Statute of Frauds would have applied and the guaranty must have been in writing, but as having made wilfully false representations as to the credit of others, whom the plaintiffs were thereby induced to Representations in the nature of guaranties.

trust, and so committed a tortious act, for which they were liable to the party deceived in damages. Now these representations might have been made the ground of an action although not in writing; for they did not amount to guaranties, but were of the same description as the false representations spoken of hereafter in the chapter on Sales; and yet it very often happened, that the same evidence which would have proved a parol guaranty, would also prove such representation of solvency as has just been described. The 4th section of the Statute of Frauds being thus frequently evaded, it was, in order to remedy the mischief, enacted in stat. 9 Geo. 4, c. 14, commonly called Lord Tenterden's Act, that

"Sect. 6. No action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon or by reason of any representation or assurance, made or given concerning or relating to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings of any other person, to the intent or purpose that such other person may obtain credit, money, or goods upon (i), unless such representation or assurance be made in writing (k), signed by the party to be charged therewith."

The effect of this section was elaborately discussed in the great case of Lyde v. Barnard (l), where the Court was equally divided, Lord Abinger, C. B., and Gurney, B., holding that a representation of the solvency of a fund belonging to A., in order that a third party might advance money on the security thereof, was a representation within the meaning of this Act, Parke, B., and Alderson, B., holding the reverse, unless, indeed, it should appear that the representation, though concerning the state of the fund, had partly reference to A.'s own personal solvency. This question was touched on in Swann v. Phillips (m), where the Court of Queen's Bench seems to have been in favour of the opinion of Lord Abinger and Baron Gurney.

Where the defendant has received the proceeds of goods obtained by his debtor from the plaintiff by means of a misrepresentation by the defendant falling within this statute, though an action may possibly lie to recover back the money, still, if the whole case rests on the misrepresentation, the statute applies, and it must be shown to have been in writing (n).

The Act applies to a representation made by one partner concerning the credit of the firm (o).

The signature of an agent of the person making the representation is not sufficient (p).

CHAPTER XII.

CONTRACTS OF SALE.

SECTION 1. Ability of Vendor to Sell.
2. Form and Requisites of Contract.
3. Duties of Vendor.
4. Duties of Vendee.
5. Effect of Illegality.

Contracts of sale.

SALE is used in two senses—(1) as an executory contract, and (2) as an executed contract of sale or a conveyance: (1) as a contract which does not pass the property, but gives a right of action against the seller; and (2) as a contract which passes the property and gives a right ad rem. Used in the sense of a conveyance, it may be defined as a contract, by which the property in goods, wares, and merchandises is transferred from one person to another in consideration of a price paid or to be paid (a).

Barter or Exchange is, correctly speaking, a transmutation of property from one man to another, for a consideration not given (a) 2 Bl. Com. 446. Lord Blackburn defines sale as "a mutual agreement between the owner of goods and another, that the property in the goods shall for some price or consideration be transferred to the other at such a time and in such a manner as is then agreed." Introduction to Blackburn on Sale, 1st ed., p. 3. In the Indian Contract Act, s. 77, sale is defined as "the exchange of property for a price. It involves the transfer of the ownership of the thing sold from the seller to the buyer." See also Benjamin on Sale, 4th ed. pp. 1, 82; South Australian Insurance Co. v. Randell, L. R. 3 P. C. 101; Dixon v. London Small Arms Co., 1 App. Cas. 632; Ex parte Bright, 10 Ch. in money, but in some other sort of commodity (b). The distinction is for most purposes immaterial. Payment, if the parties so agree, need not be in money.

A transfer of property means primâ facie an entire disposition, as, in case of land, of the fee simple. Property is, however, used in a less extensive sense, and not necessarily as meaning the right to deal with an article to the full extent permitted by law. Only a part of the rights forming the idea of property may be transferred. Thus it may be said that the property in goods has passed to the purchaser though, in fact, the vendor retains the right in certain contingencies of selling, and though, in the event of his insolvency, the property in the goods will vest in the vendor's trustee in bankruptcy. Hence such expressions as "general property" and "special property" are in use (c). Whether the first or second is passed in a contract of sale is to be determined by the intention of the parties.

Section I.—Ability of Vendor to Sell.

Ability of vendor to sell.

Where a man has in himself the property in goods, the general rule is, that he, and he only, may dispose of them by sale to whomsoever and however he pleases (d). Provided that a judgment have not been obtained against him and a writ of execution, whereby the goods may be seized or attached, actually delivered to, and remains unsatisfied in the hands of, the sheriff, of which the buyer has notice (e); for then the goods are bound to answer the debt from the time of delivering the writ to the sheriff, as they formerly were from its teste (f). Even in that case, as the property remains in him, he may dispose of them, subject to the sheriff's right to seize by virtue of the execution. And a valid sale might formerly be made of them in market overt, and may now (f) be made for a valuable consideration, and before seizure, to any bonâ fide purchaser who has not notice of any writ against the vendor's goods remaining unexecuted in the hands of the sheriff, even after the delivery of the writ to him (g).

(c) See Jenkyns v. Brown, 14 Q. B. 496, where the "general property" is said to have passed to the plaintiff, while a "special property" passed to the defendants.

Where a man has not in himself the property of goods, but only the possession, as if he be a thief or finder (h), he nevertheless may make a valid sale, so that the buyer will be secure of his purchase; provided that such sale be made in market overt during the usual market hours. This market overt, in the country, is only held on special days provided for particular places by charter or prescription. But in the City of London every day, except Sunday, is market day. The market place, or spot of ground set apart by custom for the sale of particular goods, is, also, in the country, the only market overt; but in London every shop in which goods are exposed publicly and openly to sale is market overt, but for such things only as the owner professes to trade in (i).

There are some cases in which even a sale in market overt will not secure the purchaser; as if the goods were the property of the king, or if the buyer knew they were not the seller's, or was guilty of any other fraud in the transaction. Nor do the privileges of the market overt embrace sales made in a covert place within its limits, as in a back room or warehouse, or in a shop whose windows are closed up (j); sales between sun setting and sun rising (k); cases in which the treaty for sale was begun out of market overt or by sample (l); sales of goods not usually sold in that particular market (m), the bulk not being in the market. Neither does the rule respecting sales in market overt extend to gifts (n) or pawning (o). Notwithstanding any intervening sales, if the original vendor, who sold without having the property, come again into possession of the goods, the original owner's right to them will revive (p).

Apparently the statute, while protecting an innocent purchaser, does not protect an innocent vendor; he may be liable to the true owner (q). In general, a sale in market overt will secure the purchaser, though the goods purchased have been stolen; yet stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 100 (r), enacts that—

"If any person guilty of any such felony or misdemeanor as is mentioned in this Act (s), in stealing, taking, obtaining, extorting, embezzling, converting, or disposing of, or in knowingly receiving any chattel, money, valuable security, or other property whatsoever, shall be indicted for such offence by or on behalf of the owner of the property, or his executor or administrator, and convicted thereof, in such case the property shall be restored to the owner or his representative; and in every case in this section aforesaid, the Court before whom any person shall be tried for any such felony or misdemeanor shall have power to award, from time to time, writs of restitution for the said property, or to order the restitution thereof in a summary manner."

The property, therefore, in the chattel upon conviction becomes revested in the owner, who may bring an action for its recovery against any person who detains it, notwithstanding no writ of restitution or order under the statute has been made, as the remedy thus afforded is cumulative (t). The statute applies to cases where goods have been obtained by false pretences, even where the property has passed. G. was induced by false pretences to sell goods to K. and H. who were prosecuted and convicted. Afterwards the goods were sold in market overt to B., who had no notice of the fraud. K. and H. were subsequently convicted of obtaining goods by false pretences. The House of Lords decided that the property in the goods revested in G., the seller, upon conviction of K. (u). The statute does not affect a person who purchased the goods in market overt after the felony, and disposed of them again before the conviction (v). And the section provides that:—

(s) There is an exception in the section in the case of the prosecution for a misdemeanor of any trustee, banker, merchant, attorney, factor, broker, or other agent intrusted with the possession of goods or documents of title to goods.

"If it shall appear, before any award or order made, that any valuable security shall have been bonâ fide paid or discharged by some person or body corporate liable to the payment thereof, or, being a negotiable instrument, shall have been bonâ fide taken or received by transfer or delivery for a just and valuable consideration, without any notice or without any reasonable cause to suspect that the same had by any felony or misdemeanor, been stolen, taken, obtained, extorted, embezzled, converted or disposed of, in such case the Court shall not award or order the restitution of such security."

There are some very peculiar provisions with respect to the sale of horses in market overt enacted by stat. 2 & 3 Phil. & M. c. 7, and 31 Eliz. c. 12. These enactments require that the sellers of horses at fairs, &c., shall be known to the toll-keeper or some other credible person, and a note of the sales and the prices entered in the toll-keeper's book, and a note given to the buyer. Stat. 31 Eliz. c. 12, gives the owner of a stolen horse a right to redeem it at any time within six months on paying the price bonâ fide given (x).

There are some cases in which a valid sale may be made by virtue of a power conferred by agreement or by law on the vendor not being the owner of the goods sold. Thus, a sheriff after seizure (y) of the goods of the execution debtor may sell according to the exigency of the writ of execution: and if that writ be afterwards set aside, the vendee does not seem liable to return the goods, provided he has acted bonâ fide (z). But the vendee under a distress warrant, issued upon a conviction, and invalid upon the face of it, has been thought not to be similarly protected (a).

An agent or a person in possession of certain documents generally used as symbols of property is, in many cases, able to make a valid sale of the goods of another by the provisions of the Factors Act, which are set out at length and commented upon in a preceding chapter (b).

There is an apparent exception in the case of contracts of sale induced by fraud. When the vendor intends to part with the property and possession, such contracts are voidable, not void. If, before the contract is avoided, the purchaser sells the goods, a second purchaser for value without notice of the fraud will acquire a good title as against the original owner (c), unless, as we have seen, the first purchaser be convicted under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96 (d).

Ability of vendor to sell.

Negotiable instruments are also an exception to the general rule, that a valid sale cannot be made, except in market overt, of property, to which the vendor has no right; the nature of these, and their transferability, has already been discussed in Book II., Chap. IV., to which the reader is referred.

Property in goods may by estoppel be acquired as against the true owners from persons who are not the owners, that is to say, the actual owners may act so as to lead to the belief that others are the true owners. In virtue of this principle, if an undischarged bankrupt is allowed by the trustee to trade and to get credit, the new creditors will be entitled to be paid out of the assets in priority to the old creditors (e). For similar reasons, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, property which is in the reputed ownership of the bankrupt in the circumstances stated in sect. 44, passes to the trustee.

Again, persons holding certain securities are entitled to sell. Thus a pawnee, though not possessing the property in the article pledged or pawned, may, unlike a person having a mere lien, on default by the pledgor or pawnor, or after the lapse of a reasonable time, sell the goods deposited with him (f), becoming a trustee for the pledger or pawner in respect of the surplus, if any, of the price after deducting the amount advanced, &c. The sale of pledges by pawnbrokers is now regulated by the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872 (g).

By many statutes persons are empowered to sell goods of which they are not the owners; e.g., high bailiffs of County Courts under execution in those Courts (by 51 & 52 Vict. c. 43, s. 154); trustees in bankruptcy (by 46 & 47 Vict. c. 52, s. 56 (1)); liquidators of joint stock companies (by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, s. 95, par. 3); innkeepers by the Innkeepers Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 38).

Ability of vendor to sell.

A recovery in trespass or trover in respect of personal chattels, followed by satisfaction, operates against the plaintiff, as if there had been a sale to the defendant, for solutio pretii emptionis loco habetur; otherwise, if not followed by satisfaction, or, it is said, if the damages are not estimated on the footing of the full value (h).

Section II.—Form and Requisites of a Contract of Sale.

A sale of goods must either be by deed or parol. A sale by deed is not, at present, very usual, except in cases where the thing sold is of some importance, as where the vendor wishes to convey his entire property to the vendee, or where the sheriff sells under an execution. When such a deed, which is denominated a bill of sale, is executed, the property in the goods conveyed by it passes out of the vendor into the vendee, by its delivery (i).

A sale of goods must either be by parol or deed. A parol sale of goods might, according to the common law, have been in every instance effected either by (1) an agreement to be completed in presenti, coupled with tender, part payment, or delivery of a part of the goods by way of earnest, or (2) by an agreement to be completed in futuro (k).

"If one sell me a horse, or any other thing, for money or any other valuable consideration, and the same thing is to be delivered (h) See the authorities collected in the learned notes to Holmes v. Wilson, 10 A. & E. 503; judgment of Tindal, C. J., in Cooper v. Shepherd, 3 C. In detinue the property in the goods is in the plaintiff, and the judgment is that he do recover them; but if he obtains the value of the goods in execution, instead of the goods, it would seem on the same reasoning that the property in the goods passes to the defendant. to me at a day certain, and by our agreement a day is set for the payment of the money; or all or part of the money is paid in hand; or I give earnest money (albeit it be but a penny) to the seller; or I take the thing bought by agreement into my possession, where no money is paid, earnest given, or day set for the payment; in all these cases there is a good bargain and sale of the thing to alter the property" (l).

The presumption was that the price was to be paid concurrently with the delivery of the chattels. Hence, if A. agreed to pay so much for goods, and B., the owner, agreed to take it, and no more passed, but the parties had separated, this agreement would have become void and unavailable (m), such separation being equivalent to a mutual consent to rescind it. But if B. had tendered the goods, or A. the price (n), or B. had received any part of the price, though but a penny, or A. any, even the very smallest, portion of the goods (o), both would have been bound to their bargain; though B. would in no case have had a right to the remainder of the price until he was himself ready to deliver the goods to A., and A. no right to the possession of the goods till he was ready to pay the whole of the price to B. (p). The bargain and sale might be on credit, expressly provided for, or inferred from usage, or the circumstances of the case.

After a payment or tender of the entire price, the property of the goods became vested in the vendee, so that he might, if the vendor had refused to deliver them, have maintained trover, and would have had to bear the loss had he of his own will permitted them to remain in the vendor's hands, and they had there been accidentally destroyed (q). effect of part payment or earnest be to bind the bargain and alter the property, or merely to prove the contract, has been much discussed (r). It is submitted that the effect of payment of earnest is to prove the contract, but that the property passes independently of this by the mere agreement of the parties (s).

(1) Of goods as to which nothing is required by the contract to be done by the seller before delivery in accordance with the contract;

(2) Of goods as to which the seller is bound under the contract to do something, in order to make them properly deliverable, or to determine their price;

(3) Of goods which must be separated from the mass or bulk before delivery;

(4) Of goods not yet made or manufactured;

(5) Of goods which are to form part of other goods or chattels.

In all these cases the general rule is, that the intention of the parties determines when the property passes; acts which would be held to amount to a transfer of the property will not have that effect if the intention of the parties to the contrary be apparent from the contract; and the rules which follow do not, therefore, hold good when an intention at variance with them can be deduced from the words or acts of the parties. The parties may make, expressly or by implication, any term or condition precedent to passing the property, so that it will not pass even if the goods be delivered. Thus, in the class of cases of which Shepherd v. Harrison (t) is an example, where a bill of lading accompanies a bill of exchange sent to the vendors, the acceptance of the latter is a condition precedent to passing the property, which remains in the seller though the goods are in the purchaser's hands. So, in hiring agreements as to furniture, by which the hirer agrees to pay for the furniture in instalments, the property does not pass to the hirer until all the instalments are paid (u). But in the absence of any term, express or implied, in the contract, the rules here enumerated apply.

(1) The rule as to Class (1) is thus stated by Lord Blackburn (v) :—

"A contract for a valuable consideration, by which it is agreed that the property in a specific ascertained article shall pass from one to another, is effectual, according to the law of England, to change the property. It may be that the party who has sold the article is entitled to retain possession till the price is paid, if that was by the contract to precede delivery, but still the property is changed."

The same judge thus lucidly explains and illustrates this rule (w) :—

"By the English law when there was what civilians would call emptio perfecta, and what English lawyers call a bargain and sale—a contract for good and valuable consideration to pass the property in particular chattels—as soon as that was ascertained the property did pass, and the purchaser, although he might not be entitled to delivery, for there might be a vendor's lien or something else to prevent delivery, was entitled nevertheless to the property in the goods, to the jus in re as well as to the jus ad rem. That made a very considerable practical difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland; for the law of Scotland was like the civil law upon which it was founded, the maxim of the civil law being traditionibus et usucapionibus non nudis pactis transferuntur rerum dominia (x). When there was not an actual delivery,—however complete the contract might be, although it was emptio perfecta to the fullest extent, amounting to all that in the great chapter of the Digest upon that subject has been considered to be emptio perfecta, and although every farthing of the price was paid—yet the dominium rei, the jus in re, did not pass to the purchaser. Although he had the

The right of the buyer to the goods, as against third persons, may, in certain circumstances, be affected by the seller being allowed to remain in possession. If the seller becomes bankrupt, the property in the goods may, under sect. 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (y), pass to his trustee as goods in his possession, order, or disposition, in his trade or business, by the consent of the true owner, under such circumstances that he is the reputed owner thereof. The buyer may also be deprived of the goods by the operation of the Bills of Sale Acts; the transaction, if evidenced (a) by a bill of sale (b), whether absolute or by way of mortgage, must be registered under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, otherwise the bill of sale will be void as against trustees in bankruptcy, or sheriff's officers and execution creditors taking the goods in execution (c). The bill of sale, if given by way of security for the payment of money, must not only be registered but be in the form prescribed by the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, otherwise it will be void (d). If the sale be fraudulent, for the purpose of defeating creditors, it will be void within stat. 13 Eliz. c. 5. The fact of the seller remaining in possession is evidence of fraud (e). A second sale by a purchaser in market overt would, as has already been stated, confer a good title upon a second purchaser (f).

(2) As regards Class (2), Lord Blackburn says:—

"It is essential that the article should be specific and ascertained in a manner binding on both parties, for unless that be so, it cannot be construed as a contract to pass property in that article. And in general, if there are things remaining to be done by the seller to the article before it is in a state in which it is to be finally delivered to the purchaser, the contract will not be construed to be one to pass the property till those things are done" (g).

If nothing remains to be done to the goods (gg) on the part of the seller as between him and the buyer before the goods purchased are to be delivered, or the price to be ascertained, the property in the goods immediately passes to the buyer, and that in the price to the seller, unless the parties have agreed to the contrary (h). But if any act remains to be done on the part of the seller, or seller and purchaser jointly, then the property does not pass until that act has been done. Where there was a bargain for the sale of hay, which was not to be paid for till a future period, and not to be cut down until paid for, it was held, nevertheless, that the property passed to the vendee, and that, the hay being, before the day of payment, accidentally destroyed, the loss must fall upon him (i). It might have been thought immaterial whether these acts remained to be done by the seller or the buyer; in either case, it might have been argued that an essential element of the contract, the consent of both parties as to the subject-matter of the contract or its price, was wanting until both were agreed as to this. The authorities, however, seem to show that when the goods have to be weighed or measured by the buyer solely for his satisfaction, or where the seller has left the matter to be determined by the buyer, the property passes (k).

Classes (3) and (4) may for this purpose be considered together.

Any act by the buyer in pursuance of a term of the contract, showing an intention to appropriate certain specific goods to the fulfilment of the contract, and adopted by the seller, constitutes an appropriation, and converts an executory contract into a bargain and sale.

"The selection of the goods by the one party, and the adoption of that act by the other, converts that which before was a mere agreement to sell into an actual sale, and the property thereby passes" (l).

In other words, when the parties have not agreed in the original contract as to specific goods, they may agree afterwards that certain goods should be appropriated to that purpose. Thus, election and assent have the same effect as if specific goods had been ascertained and agreed upon in the original contract (m). Two questions have here arisen: (1) When has the seller finally made his election, so as to render it irrevocable? and (2) What will constitute adoption by the buyer? The principle of the common law as to election is thus stated by Coke and by Lord Blackburn:—

"When election is given to several persons, there the first election made by any of the parties shall stand. In case election be given of two several things, always he who is the first agent, and who ought to do the first act, shall have the election" (n).

"When once he [the party who is to do the first act] has performed the act, the choice has been made, and the election irrevocably determined; till then, he may change his mind as to what the choice shall be, for the agreement gives him till that time to make his choice" (o).

Mere preparations to perform the contract, by appropriating a particular article to it, are not tantamount to election. Thus, in Atkinson v. Bell (p), the defendant had ordered two machines to be supplied by S., according to a pattern to be approved by K. S. completed two machines, altered them to suit the suggestions of K., packed them in boxes, and wrote to the defendant asking by what conveyance they should be sent. S. having become

But it may be urged that it really was a case in which there was no adoption of the appropriation. bankrupt, the Court of King's Bench decided that an action for goods bargained and sold would not lie. To the same effect is Borrowman v. Free (q). In that case the plaintiffs first tendered a cargo of maize, which the defendants refused to accept, and which an arbitrator, to whom the matter was referred, decided was an invalid tender. The plaintiffs thereupon, within the time limited by the contract, tendered another cargo, which the defendants refused to accept. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the plaintiffs were free to make a second tender, and that the defendants were bound to accept it.

There must be both appropriation by the seller, and adoption by the buyer. The latter may, after the contract is concluded, do something which will be an approbation of the seller's appropriation; as in Sparkes v. Marshall (r), where the buyer showed his assent to the appropriation of a particular cargo of oats by insuring them. But the buyer may in the contract agree to or authorize a particular mode of appropriation. "The assent of the vendee," says Willes, J., in Campbell v. Mersey Docks (s), "may be given prior to the appropriation by the vendor; it may be either express or implied; and it may be given by an agent of the party—by the warehouseman or wharfinger, for instance." For instance, the vendor placing goods in sacks or bottles supplied by the purchaser amounts to an appropriation of the goods (t).

The following are cases in which it was held that there was no appropriation: marking particular goods without making any charge in the warehouse-keeper's books, or holding the

On the other hand, see Gath v. Lees, 3 H. & C. 558, where the facts were as follows: the defendant agreed to buy from the seller a quantity of cotton, to be delivered at seller's option in August or September, 1864. The seller gave notice to the defendant that the cotton was ready for delivery in August. Held that, having exercised his option, the defendant was bound to deliver in August, and that non-delivery in that month was a good equitable defence to an action for non-delivery. See Johnson v. L. & Y. Rail. Co., 3 C. P. D. 499. Brett, J., says, in Borrowman v. Free, p. 505, "Gath v. Lees was not decided upon the doctrine of election, but upon the ground that the defendants, having acted upon the notice of the plaintiff, had altered their position for the worse."

seller liable for the rent (u); sending the goods ordered packed with others not ordered (x).

The word "appropriation" is not used in the older cases; its equivalent is "election" (y), a term in many respects apter. In Wait v. Baker (z), Parke, B., points out the different significations of the word "appropriation": "It may mean a selection on the part of the vendor where he has the right to choose the article which he has to supply in performance of his contract. Or the word may mean that both parties have agreed that a certain article shall be delivered in pursuance of the contract. 'Appropriation' may also be used in another sense . . . . where both parties agree upon the specific article in which the property is to pass, and nothing remains to be done in order to pass it."

Delivery, as we have seen (a), is not required at common law to pass the property. It is, however, one of the commonest and clearest ways in which appropriation is signified, and, after delivery to the vendee, the property in goods will pass to him, even though something remains to be done in respect of them by the vendor (b). Delivery to the purchaser or his agent—for example, to a carrier specially designated by him or to the ordinary carrier—in general passes the property (c). But the delivery may be on a condition, the breach of which re-vests the property in the vendor, and entitles him to recover back the property (d). Delivery of goods on board the purchaser's own vessel will generally be conclusive of an appropriation sufficient to pass the property, at all events if the goods are made deliverable to the purchaser or his order (e). Such, however, will not be the effect if, as in Turner v. Trustees of Liverpool Docks (f), the bill of lading makes the goods deliverable to the order of the seller. In short, the question is one of the intention of the shipper—whether he put them on board in pursuance of his contract, or whether he desired to remain owner of the goods and to control them (g)—a point to be ascertained from the form of the bill of lading, terms of the invoice, and other facts. The most common case of goods being delivered without the property passing, is that of goods delivered on "sale or return." There is no sale until approval or after the lapse of a reasonable time without return of the goods; and in the latter case, apparently, it matters not that they have not been returned through the wrongful acts of a servant, e.g., theft by a servant (h).

(5) At common law there could not be a sale, as distinguished from a contract of sale, of chattels not in existence. But a chattel not complete, or its materials (i), may be from time to time appropriated, while in the course of making, by agreement, or by special circumstances showing an intention to that effect, or by acceptance or part payment after its completion.

Wood v. Bell (k) is a case in point. A shipbuilder had agreed to build a steamship and engines for the plaintiff; payment to be made by instalments. Some of them had been paid; the ship and engines had been constructed: but neither they nor the plates had been fixed. The Exchequer Chamber held that in these circumstances the property in the ship, but not in the engines or plates, had passed. In Tripp v. Armitage (l), A. agreed to build a house, make window frames, and fix them; and they were approved by a surveyor. It was held that the property in them did not pass before fixing; the surveyor's approval of them did not amount to an appropriation.

There is no consensus of opinion as to the test to be applied in such cases. Lord Blackburn, in Seath v. Moore (m), thus states it:—

"It is competent to parties to agree for valuable consideration that a specific article shall be sold and become the property of the purchaser as soon as it has attained a certain stage; though if it is part of the bargain that more work shall be done on the article after it has reached that stage, it affords a strong primâ facie presumption against its being the intention of the parties that the property should then pass. It is, I think, a question of the construction of the contract in each case at what stage the property shall pass; and a question of fact whether that stage has been reached."

The explanation given in Atkinson v. Bell (n) is that the payments constituted a purchase of particular portions of the work. It would seem that in the above cases the common law courts have been led by independent reasoning to the same conclusion at which equity judges had arrived in regard to equitable assignments. All that is essential to the sale is an agreement as to specific articles: and if it be clear from the terms of the contract or the acts of the parties that there has been an appropriation with adoption, or assent, the property will be held to have passed (o).

Though the property in goods has passed to the purchaser, he has, in the absence of any provision to the contrary, no right to possession until payment. Though the loss will fall on the purchaser in the event of the article being destroyed, he will not be entitled to delivery until he pays the price (p). Where, however, the day of payment is deferred—in other words, where

The unpaid vendor's rights are usually termed a "lien," which in strictness means a personal right continuing only so long as the possessor retains possession. It is on all hands agreed that the "unpaid vendor's rights" are greater than a mere right of detention, but to what extent is somewhat uncertain. In Martindale v. Smith (r), the plaintiff, who had purchased oat stacks on credit, did not pay at the appointed time. He afterwards tendered payment, which was refused by the defendant, who sold the oats, on which the defendant brought trover against him, and was held entitled to recover. On the other hand, in Milgate v. Kebble (s), where the purchaser was in default in paying a portion of the price, and the vendor re-sold the goods, it was held that trover would not lie, as the purchaser by his default had not the right to possession of the goods. In Page v. Cowasgee Edulgee (t), where the Privy Council had the point under consideration, the effect of the decisions up to that time (A.D. 1866) was thus stated (u) :—

"Martindale v. Smith (v) and other cases have determined that, where there is an agreement to purchase property, to be paid for at a future time, and the money is not paid at the day, the property remaining in the possession of the vendor, he has no right to sell it, and if he does, the purchaser may maintain trover against him. There may be cases where the vendor might sell without rendering himself liable to an action, as where goods sold are left in the possession of the vendor, and the purchaser will not remove them and pay the price, after receiving express notice from the vendor that, if he fail so to do, the goods will be re-sold. But the authorities are uniform on this point, that if before actual delivery the vendor re-sells the property while the purchaser is in default, the re-sale will not authorise the purchaser to consider the contract rescinded, so as to entitle him to recover back any deposit of the price, or to resist paying any balance of it which may be still due."

Form and requisites of a contract of sale.

Though goods have been sold on credit, which has not expired, the seller's right to retain possession revives in the event of the insolvency of the purchaser (x). Though the nature of the seller's rights under these circumstances is indefinite, it is clear that bankruptcy will not of itself rescind the contract and entitle him to re-sell; there must be something equivalent to a repudiation of the contract (y). Even in the case of bankruptcy, the buyer's trustee in bankruptcy may elect to fulfil the contract on paying the price in cash, provided he does so within a reasonable time. Failing this, the vendor may, without making any tender of the goods to the trustee, treat the contract as broken (z).

As soon as the property has passed to the vendee, it remains, as was before stated, at his risk; a doctrine strongly exemplified by a case in which Irish butters were shipped for a person in London; "payment, bill at two months from the date of landing." The butter having been lost by shipwreck, it was held that the object of the above stipulation was merely to fix the time of payment, not to make the landing of the goods a condition precedent; and that the vendor, having waited a reasonable time, might recover the price from the vendee in an action for goods bargained and sold (a).

Such was the common law respecting sales of personal property. Such is still the law respecting sales of goods under the value of 10*l.*, with this addition, that, as provided by the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, no action that is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof, can be maintained on any agreement for the sale of them, unless the agreement be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised (b). On this provision it has been decided, that an agreement is valid, though not in writing, if it possibly could be performed within the year (c). Thus, a contract to deliver goods at the return of a particular ship, would not be within the meaning of this section, for the ship might possibly return within a year; and though it should, in point of fact, remain abroad for five years, that would make no difference. This section of the Statute of Frauds does not require an agreement to be in writing, one part of which is to be performed within a year and the other not (d).

With respect to contracts for the sale of goods of the value of 10*l. and upwards*, they, besides being within the section of the Statute of Frauds just commented upon, are also governed by the 17th section (16th in the Revised Statutes), which enacts, that—

"No contract for the sale of any goods, wares or merchandises, for the price (e) of 10*l.* or upwards, shall be allowed to be good, except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold, and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part of payment, or that some note or memorandum in writing of the said bargain be made and signed by the parties to be charged by such contract, or their agents thereunto lawfully authorised."

No contract for the sale of any goods, wares or merchandises.—A distinction was formerly taken between cases in which the thing contracted for was in existence and capable of delivery at the time of the contract, and cases in which it was necessary that something should be done, in order to render it capable of delivery. The former cases were universally allowed to be within the Act, but the decisions on the question whether the latter were so were not very consistent (f). However, by Lord Tenterden's Act, 9 Geo. 4, c. 14, s. 7 (g), it is enacted that the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds shall extend to all contracts for the sale of goods to the value of 10*l.* sterling and upwards, notwithstanding the goods may be intended to be delivered at some future time, or may not, at the time of such contract, be actually made (h), procured or provided, or fit or ready for delivery, or some act may be requisite for the making or completing thereof, or rendering the same fit for delivery.

Are things attached to the soil, e.g., timber, or an interest in land, within the 4th section, "goods, wares, and merchandizes" within the 17th section, as explained by 9 Geo. 4, c. 14, s. 7? When there is a contract to buy and sell the growing produce of land, afterwards to be cut down by the purchaser, and the property is to pass before severance, the contract is not for the sale of goods, but for an interest in land. But if the

"We will detain the reader to consider, one by one, the parts of this important section, which, as has been remarked by Bosanquet, J., in Laythoarp v. Bryant (2 Bing. N. C. 747), is stronger than the 4th, for the 4th section does not avoid contracts not signed as the statute directs, but only enacts that no action shall be brought upon them. The 17th section is stronger, and avoids contracts not made as the statute prescribes." In Leroux v. Brown, 12 C. B. 801; 22 L. J. C. P. 1, cited in Jones v. Victoria Graving Dock, 2 Q. B. D. at p. 323, it was held that a verbal agreement made abroad and good there, cannot be enforced in this country. But Lord Blackburn, in Maddison v. Alderson, 8 App. Cas. 467, at p. 488, in the House of Lords, says: "I think it is now finally settled that the true construction of the Statute of Frauds, both the 4th and the 17th sections, is not to render the contracts within them void, still less illegal, but is to render the kind of evidence required indispensable when it is sought to enforce the contract." See, also, Britain v. Rossiter, 11 Q. B. D. 123, at p. 127, per Brett, L. J.; and Williams v. Wheeler, 8 C. B. N. S. 299, at p. 316, per Willes, J.

contract is that the produce shall be forthwith severed from the land, as in Marshall v. Green (i), where the contract was to sell growing timber, "the trees to be got away as soon as possible," the Court decided that this was a contract for the sale of goods, on the principle stated by Williams, J., in the notes to Duppa v. Mayo (k), that "with respect to emblements or fructus industriales (i.e., the corn and other growths of the earth which are produced not spontaneously, but by labour and industry), a contract for the sale of them is not a contract for the sale of any interest in land, but merely for the sale of goods."

(1) "Where the subject-matter of the contract is growing in the land at the time of the sale, then, if by the contract the thing sold is to be delivered at once by the seller, the case is not within the section" (i.e., s. 4).

The following rules, it is said, express the effect of Smith v. Surman (n) :—

(2) "Where, although the thing may have to remain in the ground some time, it is to be delivered by the seller finally, and the purchaser is to have nothing to do with it until it is severed, that case is not within the section" (i.e., s. 4).

(3) "Then there comes the class of cases where the purchaser is to take away the thing himself. In such a case, when the things are fructus industriales (that is, emblements or corn and other growth of the earth, annually produced not spontaneously, but by labour), then, although they are still to derive from the land after the sale in order to become fit for delivery, nevertheless it is merely a sale of goods, and not within the section" (i.e., s. 4).

These express the effect of Sainsbury v. Matthews (o) :—

(4) "If they (the things produced) are not fructus industriales, then the question seems to be whether it can be gathered from the contract that they are intended to remain in the land for the advantage of the purchaser, and are to derive benefit from so remaining; then part of the subject-matter of the contract is the interest in land, and the case is within the section."

(5) "But if the thing, not being fructus industriales, is to be delivered immediately, whether the seller is to deliver it or the buyer is to enter and take it himself, then the buyer is to derive no benefit from the land, and consequently the contract is not for an interest in the land, but relates solely to the thing sold itself."

It is open to doubt whether some of the cases could be sustained on appeal (p).

A sale of standing timber to be cut at once is within the 17th, and not within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds (q). A contract for the sale of tenants' fixtures is within neither of them (r). A sale of stock is not within the 17th section (s); a contract for shares in a canal navigation or similar public undertaking is not so (t); nor is a contract to procure goods and carry them (u). Sales by auction are (x); though that was once doubted (y).

When several articles, each of less value than 10*l.*, but collectively of greater, are sold, the statute will apply if there was one contract for all (z).

Except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold and actually receive the same.—In consequence of these words, there has, ever since the Act, been a great struggle to determine what is a part performance, a receipt, or an acceptance. Upon these points, the inclination of the Courts is, to give the words of the statute full effect, and not to allow, unnecessarily, constructive deliveries and acceptances.

Form and requisites of a contract of sale.

The statute requires both acceptance and receipt. Receipt signifies an intention manifested by the buyer to take under and in satisfaction of the contract the goods tendered. Goods may be received, and yet nothing may be done to show that they are received under a contract, or to indicate acceptance (a). One who is authorised and is an agent to receive—a carrier, for example—may not be an agent to accept (b). There may be delivery of goods without receipt, though there cannot be receipt without delivery. Whether in any case there has been an acceptance and receipt is generally a question of fact. But a few examples may assist the reader in determining what will or will not amount to acceptance and receipt within the meaning of the section.

First, as to receipt: The cases as to this may be placed in the following groups:—

(a) Where the goods are actually removed from the possession of the seller into the possession of the purchaser, his agents, or servants. As to such cases there is no difficulty.

(b) Where the goods are not removed, but remain in the possession of the vendor or his agent; e.g., in his warehouse. In such cases the question is whether the vendor has agreed with the vendee to hold the goods as bailee or warehouseman, and whether he has abandoned his lien; this may be inferred from the vendor doing acts inconsistent with his position as vendor. The cases upon this subject are conflicting. In Elmore

(a) See Hunt v. Hecht, 8 Ex. 814. "An acceptance of part of the goods is an assent by the buyer, meant to be final, that this part of the goods is to be taken by him as his property under the contract, and as so far satisfying the contract. The question of acceptance or not, is a question as to what was the intention of the buyer as signified by his outward acts. The receipt of part of the goods is the taking possession of them."—Blackburn on Sale, 2nd ed., pp. 16, 17. In the article already quoted, the following is the suggested definition: "Acceptance of part of the goods sold means an assent by the buyer to a proposal by the seller that certain goods shall be part of the goods sold, whether such assent is, or is not, subject to a right on the part of the buyer to object to the bulk of the goods as not corresponding to the terms of the agreement:" Law Quarterly Review, vol. i. p. 14.

v. Stone (1809) (c), a transfer of a horse by order of the vendee from the vendor's sale-stable into another of his establishments was held sufficient. But in Carter v. Toussaint (1822) (d), it was held that there was no receipt where a horse was to remain with the vendors for twenty days without any charge to the vendee, at the expiration of which time it was sent to grass by the direction of the vendee, and, at his desire, entered as the horse of one of the vendors. In Castle v. Sworder (1861) (e), the Exchequer Chamber thought there was evidence of receipt where the plaintiffs, the vendors, appropriated to the vendees certain rum puncheons, and put them in their bond warehouse from which they could not be removed.

(c) Where the goods after the contract pass into the possession of a third person. If he be the warehouseman of the vendee, a carrier named by him, or a common carrier, there is receipt; though a carrier is not an agent to accept (f).

(d) Where the goods are at the time of the sale in the possession of an agent or bailee of the vendor, and remain after the sale in the possession of this agent or bailee, who agrees to become bailee of the vendee in place of the vendor, there is receipt as soon as the vendor, the vendee and the bailee agree together that the bailee shall cease to hold for the vendor, and shall hold for the vendee. In Farina v. Home (g) it was held that it was not sufficient, in an action for goods sold and delivered, to prove that the goods were sent to a ship agent of the plaintiff, that the agent warehoused them with a wharfinger, that the latter delivered to the agent a delivery warrant whereby the goods were made deliverable to him or his assigns, and that the agent indorsed it to the plaintiff. There might be acceptance: there was no actual receipt.

(e) Where the buyer holds the goods prior to sale. In this case receipt, or acceptance, may be evidenced by acts of the buyer inconsistent with his former possession (h).

Form and requisites of a contract of sale.

To constitute acceptance, there must be, to use the words of Bramwell, B., in Bowes v. Pontifex (i), "some act or conduct on the part of the buyer indicating an intention to retain the goods, or such as reasonably to lead the seller to suppose so." Often it may be inferred from acts of ownership by the vendee; e. g., selling the goods, as in Morton v. Tibbett (k); giving a receipt for them, as in Kibble v. Gough (l); directing alterations to be made in them (m). Apparently, dealing with the documents of title to goods will constitute acceptance (n). The opinion that there cannot be an actual acceptance such as the statute requires so long as the buyer continued to have a right to object to the quantum or quality, has long been rejected. The "acceptance need not be an absolute acceptance," said Brett, M. R., in Page v. Morgan (o), "all that is necessary is an acceptance which could not have been made except upon admission that there was a contract, and that the goods were sent to fulfil that contract." "Having regard to the mischiefs at which the statute was aimed," said Bowen, L. J., in the same case, "it would appear a natural conclusion that the acceptance contemplated by the statute was such a dealing with the goods as amounts to a recognition of the contract" (p). Acceptance of a sample which is to be accounted part of the commodity is sufficient (q), though acceptance of one which is to be no part thereof is not so (r). Acceptance may precede receipt or delivery (s). Delivery to a carrier named by the vendor, or even to a wharfinger or carrier selected by the vendee, will not generally amount to acceptance (t). the case of goods previously selected, such delivery might constitute acceptance; as in Bushel v. Wheeler (u), where, there being evidence that the purchaser treated the warehouse as his own, and delayed rejecting the goods after delivery there, the Court held that there was evidence of acceptance to go to a jury.

Where two classes of goods are jointly ordered, acceptance of one is an acceptance of both (x). It is decided that one person in possession of another's goods may become the purchaser of them by parol, and may do subsequent acts without any writing between the parties which may amount to an acceptance, and the effect of such acts, necessarily to be proved by parol evidence, must be submitted to a jury (y). At any time before acceptance and actual receipt the vendor may rescind the bargain (z).

The effect of a receipt and acceptance being proved is to allow parol evidence to be given of the terms of the contract (a).

Or give something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part payment.—Earnest is a gift or token, not necessarily money, given by the buyer to the seller to mark the final conclusive assent of both parties to the bargain. It is not a part of the price, but "something that binds the bargain," for there can be no part payment until after the bargain is bound (b). If a purchaser of goods draw the edge of a shilling over the hand of the vendor, and return the money into his own pocket (which in the North of England is called striking a bargain), that will not be sufficient (c).

If one of the terms of a bargain is that the seller is to deduct from the price the amount of a debt previously due by him to the purchaser, it is no part payment within the statute, even though the seller afterwards furnish an account giving credit for the agreed amount (d). But a subsequent agreement that the debt should be deducted from the price, or that the goods delivered should be taken in satisfaction of the debt, might be equivalent to part payment (e).

Or that some note or memorandum in writing of the bargain be made.—The note or memorandum must be in existence at the date when the action was commenced (f). A mere offer in writing made by one side, and not assented to (g) by the other, is not enough to satisfy these words. Where A. wrote to B. that he would buy his mare for twenty guineas, if warranted sound and quiet in harness; to which B. writes that he will send her, and warrant her sound and quiet in double harness; this is no contract, the proposal of A. never having been completely accepted. "The parties," said Parke, B., "never have contracted in writing ad idem" (h). But if such assent is given verbally to a written proposal containing the terms of the agreement, the statute is satisfied (i). If assent be expressed in the usual manner through the post, the bargain is complete at the time of posting, and it matters not that the letter is lost or miscarries (k). It is sufficient if the contract can be collected from several different documents, provided they be sufficiently connected in sense (l). This connection must appear from the documents themselves, and not be introduced by parol evidence; the Statute of Frauds does not modify the principle of the common law as to this (m). But such evidence as is admissible to explain a latent ambiguity may be given to connect documents; e.g., to show what are the instructions (n) referred to in a certain document. The necessary memorandum may be collected from a letter repudiating liability, and it may be addressed to a third person.

The word "bargain," used in this section, does not, it has been said, render so strict a statement of the transaction necessary as the word "agreement," used in the fourth section, of matters within that section (o). The note must express the names or descriptions of both the contracting parties as such, or their agents (p), though parol evidence will be admissible to explain words of description, e.g., who is "proprietor" (q). The memorandum must also show the price (r), if any specific price was agreed on; if no price be named, the parties must, it seems, be understood to have agreed that such a sum shall be paid as the article is reasonably worth (s).

The contract, though it must be evidenced in writing, may be rescinded by parol; an alteration, therefore, by parol of a contract, by substituting, for example, another day for the delivery of the goods, though that fresh contract, not being in writing, could not be enforced, may operate as a rescinding of the original (t). But it would be a question for the jury whether it was not a mere indulgence, and whether the parties meant to rescind the contract absolutely, and that that which could not operate according to their intention should affect existing available rights (u).

And signed by the parties to be charged.—The signature may be by printing or stamping the name (x), or by a mark or initials, if they be intended as a signature (y). The signature need not be at the foot of the note or memorandum. It may be at the beginning or in the body of the writing, if it appears to have been intended as a recognition of the contract. Thus, in Schneider v. Norris (z), the appearance of the vendor's name printed in a bill of parcels was held a sufficient signature to bind him. In this case the defendant had written the plaintiff's name in the bill of parcels. Lord Ellenborough, C. J., there said: "If, indeed, this case had rested merely on the printed name, unrecognized by and not brought home to the party as having been printed by him or by his authority, so that the printed name had been unappropriated to the particular contract, it might have afforded some doubt whether it would not be intrenching upon the statute to have admitted it. But here there is a signing by the party to be charged by words recognizing the printed name as much as if he had subscribed his mark to it, which is strictly the meaning of signing, and by that the party has incorporated and avowed the thing printed to be his. He has by his handwriting in effect said, 'I acknowledge what I have written to be for the purpose of exhibiting my recognition of the within contract'" (a). If the note commence with, "*I, A. B.; though it is otherwise where a signature at the end of the instrument was manifestly intended in order to its completion, as where it concluded, "As witness our hands" (d). And, as the statute only requires the signature of the parties to be charged, a memorandum signed by the vendor has been held sufficient to bind him, though it was not signed by the vendee; against whom, therefore, the contract could not have been enforced (e). While a person who signs such a memorandum cannot escape liability, evidence is admissible to show that a person not named in the memorandum is liable as principal (f).

It has been said by Lord Eldon (g), that "where a party, or principal, or person to be bound, signs as, what he cannot be, a witness, he cannot be understood to sign otherwise than as principal:" in that case the signature was as follows:—

"Witness, Evan Phillips, for Mr. Smith, agent for the seller."

But, where the purchaser affixed his signature to an agreement for the sale of lands, and underneath was written Witness, Joseph Newman, in the usual place for a witness's signature, Joseph Newman being the clerk of the auctioneer employed to sell the premises, it was urged that Newman must be taken to have signed as agent for the vendor, and it was attempted to show a ratification of his agency. But the Court were of opinion that he signed simply as a witness; and Lord Dennan, C. J., said, he thought Lord Eldon's remark open to much observation (h). In Eley v. Positive Assurance Co. (i), the Court of Exchequer decided that the signature of directors of a company to articles of association, declaring that the plaintiff should be solicitor to the company, was not a signature within the statute, because it was affixed alio intuitu. This case was affirmed in the Court of Appeal, but on other grounds irrespective of the Statute of Frauds. In Jones v. Victoria Dock Co. (k), the same contention was thus dealt with: "We think," says Lush, J., "there is more ingenuity than force in this argument. The signature is matter of procedure only, and is required as evidence of the contract. It matters not that the memorandum was not made at the time, or for what purpose the signature was put, if only it was put to attest the document as that which contains the terms of the contract" (l).

Or their agents, thereunto lawfully authorised.—The authority need not be in writing (m); and a subsequent recognition by the principal is sufficient evidence of its having been given (n). But it has been held that one of the contracting parties cannot be the agent of the other for this purpose (o). This decision seems to be somewhat regretted. What was the motive for signing the memorandum seems immaterial. Though it has been held that an auctioneer's signature of the defendant's name, by his authority, is insufficient to entitle the auctioneer to sue upon the contract in his own name, it is settled that a signature by the auctioneer's clerk is sufficient for that purpose (p).

Though the auctioneer, suing in his own name on the contract of sale, cannot avail himself of his character of agent for the defendant, yet, in other cases, he is looked on at a public sale as the lawfully authorised agent of both parties (q), the seller communicating his authority by giving him directions to sell; and the buyer, to whom the conditions of sale, pasted on the auctioneer's box, are sufficient notice of the terms thereof (r), by bidding aloud. And, if the auctioneer, or auctioneer's clerk (s), write down the purchaser's name in the sale book opposite the lot for which he is the highest bidder, that is a sufficient signature within the statute, and binds the purchaser (t), who perhaps may, at any time before the entry,

(s) Bird v. Boulter, supra. Where this is done by the clerk, he does not, it would seem, act as a mere automaton in the auctioneer's hand, but as a distinct agent, authorised by the parties to make entries. In that case the signature by the clerk takes place contemporaneously with the sale, when it could not conveniently be performed by the auctioneer, who is otherwise engaged. Generally speaking, the clerk of an agent has no authority to sign for the principal. See Gosbell v. Archer, 2 Ad. & E. 500; Peirce v. Corf, L. R. 9 Q. B. 210.

retract his authority, as he certainly may before the fall of the hammer (u). But if the signature be in a book or on a mere catalogue of the articles, neither connected with nor referring to the conditions of the sale, it will not be a memorandum of a sale on those conditions, unless it can be connected with them by some other written document (x). Though primâ facie the auctioneer is the agent of both parties, yet he is not so necessarily and ex vi termini. Thus, where P. bought goods at an auction, having previously agreed with their owner that he was not to pay cash, but to set off a debt due to himself against the price, he was held to have a right to do so, though the conditions of sale required payment in cash; for the previous agreement between himself and the seller rebutted the presumption of the auctioneer's authority to bind him to those conditions (y).

A broker also is generally (z), though not invariably, the agent of both parties within the section (a). The usual and proper mode in which he binds his principals inter se is by making an entry of the contract in his book, which he signs as their common agent, and he sends the bought and sold notes (which ought, according to the bond formerly required of brokers (b), to be copies of this entry) to them for their information, the bought note being sent to the buyer and the sold note to the seller (c). It has been held (d), and the better opinion (e) seems to be, that, in the absence of any custom to the contrary, the entry thus made in his book is the original contract, and the bought and sold notes are merely copies of it, though this doctrine was

But in general the broker is such agent with a limited special authority only to sign a contract containing the terms verbally agreed upon; and if he omit a material term in drawing it up, a party who has not recognised or adopted the contract as drawn up will not be bound: Pitts v. Beckett, 13 M. & W. 743.

at one time thought to be overruled (f). Still the notes seem to be the proper evidence of the bargain (g), provided always, that they correspond with each other (h). If there be no bought and sold notes (i), or if they be not signed (k), or if those notes materially differ from each other (l), the original signed entry must be resorted to, and will bind the parties. But if the notes correspond with each other, yet vary from the entry, it seems that, in the absence of any custom by which they are regarded as the contract (m), all the parties, by accepting and acquiescing in them, have ratified the bargain they express and adopted it in lieu of the original (n). If there be no entry signed by the broker, it seems the bought and sold notes constitute the contract (o). It has been held that if they do not correspond, the intended contract will not be affected (p), and that if they be altered in any material

This the Court thought wrong. At the second trial it was left to the jury as a question of fact, whether, according to the usage of trade in the city, the bought and sold notes or the broker's book constituted the contract; Denman, C. J., still retaining his opinion as expressed at the former trial upon the point of law. The jury found the bought and sold notes to be the contract.

point without the consent of the party sought to be charged, it will, as against him, be avoided (q). But a mistake in both notes as to the seller's name was considered not to vitiate the contract, if it were not shown that anyone was prejudiced thereby (r); and it has been held that a vendee was bound by a note signed by him and delivered to the vendor by the broker, though containing a provision not to be found in the note sent to the vendee (s). The text has been retained. From the cases Mr. Benjamin deduced the following rules:—

(1) The broker's signed entry in the book constitutes the contract between the parties, and is binding on both;

(2) The bought and sold notes do not constitute the contract;

(3) But the bought and sold notes, when they correspond, or state all the terms of the bargain, are complete and satisfactory evidence to satisfy the statute; even though there be no entry in the broker's book, or, what is equivalent, only an unsigned entry;

(4) Either the bought or sold note alone will satisfy the statute, provided no variance be shown between it and the other note, or between it and the signed entry in the book;

(5) Where one note only is offered in evidence, the defendant has the right to offer the other note, or the signed entry in the book, to prove a variance;

(6) As to variance between bought and sold notes—(a) when there is an entry; (b) when there is not. In the former case "this entry will in general control the case"; in the latter, it is a question of fact whether the acceptance by the parties of the bought and sold notes constitutes evidence of a new contract;

(7) Variance between correspondence and the bought and sold notes, the same rule as in case (6);

(8) If the bought and sold notes vary, and there is no signed entry in the broker's book, nor other writing showing the terms of the bargain, there is no valid contract;

(9) In sale by a broker on credit, evidence of usage is admissible that the vendor is not bound until he has had a reasonable time, after receiving the sold note, to inquire into the sufficiency of the purchaser, and to withdraw if he disapproves: Benjamin on Sals, 4th ed. p. 268.

As to these rules, it may be said that neither the notes nor entry are in strictness the contract; they are evidence of it, and the question in each case is, which document is the evidence. There may be, and often are, several memoranda of the same convendor's agent to enter a note of the contract in the vendor's book, it was held that this did not authorise the agent to bind the vendee by his signature to such entry so as to satisfy the statute (t).

Form and requisites of a contract of sale.

Section III.—Duties of Vendor.

Duties of vendor.

We have now discussed the form and requisites of a contract of sale. Next in order is the consideration of the duties it imposes. It may at the outset be stated that neither the vendor nor vendee can excuse himself from performing his side of the contract by breaking a condition which it is incumbent on himself to fulfil, although it may have been stipulated, or even enacted, that the sale on breach of such condition shall be null and void, for that means void at the election of the other party (u).

The duties of the seller arise out of—(a) conditions precedent, (b) conditions concurrent, (c) conditions subsequent, (d) warranties, and (e) representations.

When a promise is wholly dependent on the fulfilment of another, the latter is a condition precedent (x). When a promise must be fulfilled concurrently with another, they are concurrent conditions. When it is a term in a contract that the parties will be relieved from all or some of the duties under it, upon the happening of a certain event, it is a condition subsequent. A warranty is a promise forming part of the contract, the breach of which gives a right to compensation, but not to a rescission of the contract (y). It is usually said to be collateral and subsidiary to the agreement; but this appears to mean no more tract: Erle, J., in Sievewright v. Archibald, 17 Q. B. at p. 107. If they agree, they are all equally evidence of the contract; if one were lost, the other would be sufficient to satisfy the statute. If they differ it would seem to be a question of fact which is the true memorandum.

than the above definition (z). A representation is a statement, made before or at the time of the agreement, but not forming part of it, with respect to the subject-matter of it.

Delivery of Goods (a).—The vendor must deliver the goods as soon as the vendee has performed all conditions precedent on his part (b), and may, if he refuse to do so, be sued either specially for non-performance of his contract (c), or in trover or detinue (d) for the goods themselves. He may, however, stipulate to the contrary, and may sometimes be excused by causes over which he has no control, in circumstances explained below (e).

In the absence of any contract, express or implied, to the contrary, delivery means delivery at the place where the goods are at the time of sale (ee). Goods are delivered, in the sense of complying with the contract of sale, when they are placed in the vendee's power, so that he may immediately remove them, and cannot be rightfully prevented from so doing (f). Thus, if the goods be in a stranger's close, and that stranger have, before the sale, licensed the vendee to take them (as, for example, where an auctioneer sells goods on the close of a stranger), that is a delivery (g), for the auctioneer had made the only delivery possible in the circumstances. The handing of a delivery order giving the buyer an immediate right to

Where the seller has the option of delivering, or the buyer has the option of taking delivery, at more than one place, notice must be given of the particular place at which delivery is desired (k).

If it be generally mentioned that the vendor shall not merely deliver but send the goods, that means within a reasonable time, and what time is, under the circumstances, reasonable, is a question of evidence (l). If the goods be beyond sea he ought to send the bill of lading in a reasonable time, in order that the vendee may have it in his power to go to market (m). It was once considered that, whether the time of delivery be specified or left at large, the delivery should be made at a reasonable hour, in order to discharge the vendor's duty. But it has since been held that an actual tender of the goods to the purchaser, if he be at his warehouse, at any hour of the last day which will allow him time before midnight to examine, weigh and receive them, in the absence of any special custom, will be good; but that the purchaser is not bound to remain at his warehouse after a reasonable time before sunset to allow of the examination (n).

The words in contracts as to the quantity may be a condition precedent, non-observance of which will entitle the buyer to refuse to comply with the contract; or they may be a mere estimate. When the contract is to deliver "about" a certain quantity, or a certain quantity "more or less," and the quantity actually delivered differs from that specified, the seller will fulfil his duties even if there be a slight deficiency. In the case of a contract for a specific lot of goods in any way identified, e. g., the goods in a particular warehouse, or ship, or mill—the word "about" is regarded as indicative only of an estimate; if there be good faith on the part of the seller, the contract is binding, notwithstanding a slight deficiency. In Gwillim v. Daniell (o), the agreement was that A. should sell and B. buy "all the naphtha that A. might make from the 1st of June for two years, say from 1,000 to 1,200 gallons a month;" the words in italics were held only a representation. In Leeming v. Snaith (p), on the other hand, where a contract for wool was, "John Snaith, of B., sold to John Leeming & Co., what he may pull up to the 16th of January, say not less than 100 packs of combing skin at 7½ per pound." Three judges held this to be a positive contract for 100 packs at least. Where no independent circumstances indicative of the quantity sold exist, the amount named in the contract is material, and the word "about" provides merely for slight variations. The general rule is that, subject to a moderate margin, the seller cannot call upon the buyer to accept any greater or less quantity than that specified (q).

Where the contract of sale is to deliver a certain quantity of goods in monthly or other periodical instalments, failure to deliver or accept one or more of them may, in certain circumstances, be treated as a rescission of the contract, justifying the other party in refusing to accept or deliver future instalments. The point arose in Hoare v. Rennie (r). The defendant agreed to buy of the plaintiff 667 tons of Swedish iron, to be shipped by the seller in the months of June, July, August, and September, in about equal monthly portions. In June, only 21 tons were shipped. The defendant having refused to accept this quantity, or any other instalments, the seller brought an action for non-acceptance. The defendant pleaded the non-acceptance of the quantity specified in the contract, and this was held to be an answer. In Simpson v. Crippin (s), the contract was that the defendant should deliver from 6,000 to 8,000 tons of coal in equal monthly deliveries into the plaintiff's waggons, during twelve months from the 1st of July. During the first month, viz., July, the plaintiff sent waggons to receive only 158 tons, and the defendants, on the 12th of August, gave notice that the contract was cancelled. The Court of Queen's Bench, Blackburn and Lush, JJ. (Mellor, J., dissenting on the ground that he was bound by the decision in Hoare v. Rennie (t)), held that the defendants were not entitled to refuse to carry out their contract. Which of these cases is right has been a matter of doubt. In Honck v. Muller (u), there was a contract by the defendant to deliver to the plaintiff 2,000 tons of iron to be delivered in November, or equally over November, December, and January. The plaintiff did not take delivery of any iron in November, but asked to be allowed to take delivery of one-third in December and one-third in January. It was held by the Court of Appeal (Bramwell and Baggallay, L. JJ., Brett, L. J., dissenting), on the authority of Hoare v. Rennie (x), that the defendant was entitled to refuse to deliver any of the iron to the plaintiff. The Court thought that the plaintiff not having taken the whole in November, the contract must, under the circumstances, be taken to have been for delivery by equal portions during November, December, and January, and that the plaintiff, having failed to take any delivery in November, could not claim delivery during December and January of two-thirds of the whole amount bargained for. In the Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, Benzon & Co. (y), the facts were as follows: The plaintiffs agreed to deliver to the defendants 5,000 tons of steel, to be delivered 1,000 tons monthly, commencing January, 1881, payment to be within three days after receipt of shipping documents. The defendants took delivery in January and February of the January instalment. On the 2nd of February, before payment for the instalment became due, a petition was presented to wind up the plaintiff company. The defendants objected to make the payment then due, unless the sanction of the Court was obtained. The plaintiffs thereupon refused to deliver. The House of Lords decided that payment of the instalment due was not a condition precedent to the right to claim the next delivery, and that the plaintiffs were bound to perform the contract.

In cases of this kind two questions are involved. First, whether the payment for the goods already delivered is a condition precedent, and, secondly, whether the conduct of the party refusing to pay amounts to a renunciation of the contract (z). The answer to the first question depends upon the construction of the contract between the parties. "The contract," said Lord Selborne, speaking of the contract in The Mersey Steel, &c. Co. v. Naylor, Benzon & Co. (a), "is for the purchase of 5,000 tons of steel blooms of the company's manufacture; therefore it is one contract for the purchase of that quantity of steel blooms. No doubt there are subsidiary terms in the contract as to the time of delivery and as to the time of payment, but that does not split up the contract into as many contracts as there shall be deliveries for the purpose of so many distinct quantities of iron. It is quite consistent with the natural meaning of the contract, that it is to be one contract for the purchase of that quantity of iron, to be delivered at those times and in that manner, and for which payment is so to be made. It is perfectly clear that no particular payment can be a condition precedent of the entire contract, because the delivery under the contract was most certainly to precede payment." Of course it may be, and sometimes is, a condition precedent; but inasmuch as the failure to deliver can generally be satisfied by damages, it is, as a rule, not such. In order to answer the second question, whether the failure of the one party to comply with the contract amounts to a renunciation or repudiation of it, "You must examine what that conduct is, so as to see whether it amounts to a renunciation, or to an absolute refusal to perform the contract such as would amount to a rescission if he had the power to rescind, and whether the other party may accept it as a reason for rescinding" (b). When, as in Hochster v. De la Tour (c), one of the parties gives clear indication that he will not perform the contract, there is no difficulty; the other party need not wait for the breach, but may at once sue for damages. But what is meant by conduct amounting "to a renunciation or to an absolute refusal," when nothing to that effect is expressed, or there is an expression to the contrary? Some of the cases suggest that the existence of an intention to repudiate the contract is necessary. Obviously, however, an intention does not amount to a rescission, which requires the concurrence of all parties to the contract. The existence of intention would be no defence to an action unless there was a failure to comply with a condition precedent; and if there was a non-compliance with a condition precedent, the non-existence of the intention would be, it is submitted, immaterial. It is conceived that the test is (a) whether one of the parties has said, or by his conduct indicated, that he will not perform the contract; in other words, whether the principle of Hochster v. De la Tour (d) applies; and (b) if there has been a failure to perform the contract, whether the breach is of a condition precedent (e). Where the contract has been partly fulfilled, as it is impossible to put the parties in their original position, a breach which might justify a rescission of the contract if it were unfulfilled, may not have that effect (f).

D. 92; Mersey Steel Co. v. Naylor, 9 App. Cas. 434; Johnstone v. Milling, 16 Q. B. D. 460. Such cases as Bloomer v. Bernstein, L. R. 9 C. P. 588; Morgan v. Bain, L. R. 10 C. P. 15; Ex parte Chalmers, L. R. 8 Ch. 289, seem open to grave doubt. Mr. Justice Gray, delivering the judgment of the United States Supreme Court in Norrington v. Wright, 8 Davis, at p. 211, says, "upon a review of the English decisions, the rule laid down in the earlier cases of Hoare v. Rennie and Coddington v. Paleologo, as well as in the later cases of Reuter v. Sala and Honck v. Muller, appears to us to be supported by a greater weight of authority than the rule stated in the intermediate cases of Simpson v. Crippin and Brandt v. Lawrence, and to accord better with the general principles affirmed by the House of Lords

When the contract specifies a particular time of delivery or shipment, the question in each case is whether this is a warranty or condition precedent; and, speaking generally, in mercantile contracts such conditions are of the essence of the contract, upon the failure or non-performance of which the party aggrieved may repudiate the contract (g).

If no time is fixed upon for payment of the price, or if the parties have not embodied any usage as to the time, payment is to be concurrent with delivery (h).

In the absence of special stipulation, the condition precedent upon the vendee's part is readiness to pay the price (i). If the goods were to be paid for by a bill, the vendee ought to tender one (k); but the word bill will not be held to mean approved bill (l). If an approved bill be stipulated for, that means a bill to which no reasonable objection can be made (m).

There are some cases indeed in which the vendor may be obliged to deliver the goods without payment or tender of the price: these are—

First, where by special agreement between the parties the day of payment is to be subsequent to that of delivery; in other words, where the goods are sold on credit. Yet, even in such case, though the vendee has the title to the property and a right to possession (n) without payment or tender of the price, yet that right is not indefeasible, and will be defeated if he become insolvent before he has actually taken possession (o). The vendor may also refuse delivery if he has received distinct notice of the vendee's insolvency (p). Frequently there is an express or implied condition that possession shall not be given until a draft is accepted or remitted. Where goods were to be paid for by a banker's draft at two months (which is a sale at two months' credit), but by the express terms of the contract the draft was to be remitted on receipt of the invoice and bill of lading, the vendee having failed to remit a banker's draft accordingly was held not to be entitled to the possession of the goods, and consequently to have no right to maintain trover (q). In this case it will be observed that though the sale was upon credit, the vendee's right to the possession of the goods was hindered from accruing by the express stipulation of the parties, who made the delivery of the goods dependent upon that of the draft. In Ex parte Chalmers (r) this principle was applied to a contract to sell goods by instalments. H. contracted to sell to E. goods by instalments, payment to be made in cash in fourteen days from the date of each delivery; after several deliveries had been made E. became insolvent; one instalment was still unpaid for, and

B. at p. 395, is a passage which at first seems at variance with this; but I think it refers to the vendor's right to retain possession after the expiration of the time of credit, if the goods be in his hands and the price still unpaid, a right which seems to have been doubted in Bloxam v. Sanders, 4 B. & C. 941.

But see this case on writ of error, 7 M. & G. 882, where the Court held, that, from these circumstances, the jury might have inferred that the delivery of the banker's draft was a condition precedent to the vesting of the property; but that the Court could not draw such an inference; and, on the bare statement of these facts, the plaintiff was entitled to the possession. And see Barber v. Taylor, 5 M. & W. 527; Dodsley v. Varley, 12 Ad. & E. 632; Lord v. Price, L. R. 9 Ex. 54.

one delivery not yet made. It was held that H. was entitled to refuse delivery of the undelivered instalment until it and the unpaid instalment were paid for.

Secondly, where the vendor has done that which amounts to a delivery of the goods, and has thereby lost his lien (s), e. g., where he has made a symbolical transfer of property, which is by its nature (t) unfit to be delivered otherwise, as, for instance, by giving up to the vendee the key of the warehouse where it is deposited (u), or giving a delivery order to the wharfinger in whose possession it is, to which order the wharfinger has signified his assent (x), or where he has done any act which would determine his right to stop in transitu (y). But it must be observed that the converse of this last proposition is not true, for many acts will be sufficient to divest the vendor's lien for his price, which will not be sufficient to hinder him from stopping the goods in transitu if the vendee should become insolvent. For instance, delivery of goods to an agent of the vendee appointed to convey them to him, deprives the vendor of his lien for the price, but not of his right to stop the goods in transitu in case of the vendee's failure before they have reached him (z).

"If there has been a delivery of goods to the vendee and an appropriation of them to his own use, the right of stoppage does not exist; in a case of that kind the property in, and the possession of, the goods have passed to the vendee; but where the goods are in the course of transit from the vendor to the vendee, although the property has passed to the vendee, and although he has the constructive possession of them, the right to stop prevails" (a).

A delivery of part of the goods, where there is no intention of separating that part from the whole, divests both the lien and the right to stop in transitu (b). But it is otherwise where there is such an intention (c). It has been said that primâ facie a delivery of part imports an intention to deliver the whole (d). But the question in each case appears to be one of intention (e). The vendor's lien could not at common law be determined by a second sale of the same goods, for the ordinary rule of law is, that the second vendee of a chattel cannot stand in a better situation than his own immediate vendor (f). But this is modified by the Factors Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 45), ss. 9, 10 (g). Where the goods are in the vendor's own warehouse, he does not lose his lien by giving a delivery order (h). Nay, even a charge made by the vendor against the vendee for warehouse rent does not destroy his lien, at all events not where the charge is pursuant to the terms of the original contract of sale, for then the rent is only, as it were, an additional price (h). But it would perhaps be otherwise if the charge for warehouse rent were founded on a subsequent distinct contract; for that might have the effect of making the seller's warehouse that of the buyer (i). The vendor may of course avoid the sale by showing fraud in the vendee; for example, that he deterred others from bidding by his representations, or that he bought the goods with the fraudulent intention of never paying for them (k); and if the goods have been delivered in ignorance of the fraud, the vendor may recover them (l). But as the contract was voidable at his option, and not void, he cannot recover them from a bonâ fide purchaser to whom they have been sold before he elected to repudiate the contract (m).

(2.) As to Quality.—The law on this subject is thus clearly stated by Brett, J. A., delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Randall v. Newson (p).

"In all (contracts) it is either assumed or expressly stated, that the fundamental undertaking is that the article offered or delivered shall answer the description of it contained in the contract. That rule comprises all the others; they are adaptations of it to particular kinds of contracts of purchase and sale. You must, therefore, first determine from the words used or the circumstances, what, in or according to the contract, is the real mercantile or business description of the thing which is the subject-matter of the bargain of purchase or sale, or, in other words, the contract."

The sale of an existing chattel, as being of a particular description, implies a contract that it exists, and is of that description (q). Yet, in such case, no contract is, in the absence of fraud, implied of the good quality (r) or condition of the chattel so sold. Therefore, where the chattel sold was a ship (s), and the vendor covenanted that he had power to make the sale, no contract was implied that she was seaworthy; and the Court of Exchequer considered that the property in her might pass by the sale, though she was cast aground in such a manner as to be totally lost within the meaning of a policy. "Where a known, described, and defined article is ordered of a manufacturer, although it is stated to be required by the purchaser for a particular purpose, still, if the known, described, and defined article be actually supplied, there is no warranty that it shall answer the particular purpose" (t).

The following are some further applications of this principle:—

(a) On a sale of goods by description it is an implied term of the contract that they shall reasonably answer such description (u).

In Bowes v. Shand (x), in which the contract was for the sale of "three hundred tons of Madras rice, to be shipped at Madras, or coast, during the months of March $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ April, 1874, per Rajah of Cochin," and rice shipped in February was tendered, the House of Lords, reversing the judgment of the Court of Appeal, held that the contract was not fulfilled, and that the buyer was not obliged to take delivery. Lord Blackburn thus explained the law (y):—

"If the description of the article tendered is different in any respect, it is not the article bargained for, and the other party is not bound to take it. I think in this case what the parties bargained for was rice, shipped at Madras or the coast of Madras. Equally good rice might have been shipped a little to the north or a little to the south of the coast of Madras. I do not quite know what the boundary is, and probably equally good rice might have been shipped in February as was shipped in March, or equally good rice might have been shipped in May as was shipped in April, and I dare say equally good rice might have been put on board another ship as that which was put on board The Rajah of Cochin. But the parties have chosen, for reasons best known to themselves, to say: 'We bargain to take rice, shipped in this particular region, at that particular time, on board that particular ship;' and before the defendants can be compelled to take anything in fulfilment of that contract, it must be shown not merely that it is equally good, but that it is the same article as they have bargained for—otherwise they are not bound to take it."

In Allan v. Lake (z), the contract was to sell fourteen quarters of seed described as "Skirving's Swedes." Though the evidence was that the seed was of the crop which the purchaser actually saw, the vendor was bound to deliver "Skirving's Swedes."

(b) If the goods be sold to be used for a particular purpose mentioned to the seller, and the purchaser trusts to the judgment or skill of the seller, it is a term of the contract that the goods shall be reasonably fit for the purpose (a). The rule is sometimes stated in wider terms than these. But, having regard to the leading case of Jones v. Just (b), the above, it is conceived, is an accurate description of the rule. That the purchaser trusted to the seller may be inferred from the fact that the seller is the manufacturer who made them, or that the seller did not describe the nature of the goods, but merely the purpose for which they were used.

If the article be bought for a particular purpose—as in Randall v. Newson (c), where the plaintiff bought a pole for his carriage—there is no exception as to latent or undiscovered defects. The purchaser is bound to supply an article in fact reasonably fit for the purpose.

(c) In the sale of goods by sample, it is an implied condition that the bulk of the goods is equal to the sample. The implied condition that goods sold are merchantable and reasonably fit for the purposes for which they are to be used, will not be necessarily excluded by the fact that the goods were sold by sample, and that the bulk corresponds with the sample. This appears from Drummond v. Van Ingen (d), in which the goods ordered were described as worsted coatings. Those supplied corresponded in quality and weight with the patterns. The work had, however, a tendency to slip, and the purchaser, to whom patterns had been shown, contended there was an implied warranty of the goods being merchantable and suitable for the purpose for which they were ordered. The House of Lords, adopting the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Mody v. Gregson (e), held that the purchaser was entitled to reject the goods. "A purchaser," said Lord Herschell, "has a right to rely on the samples supplied representing a manufactured article, which will be fit for the purposes for which such an article is ordinarily used, just as much as he has a right to rely on manufactured goods supplied on an order without samples complying with such a warranty. . . . . There is no doubt that the implied warranty will be excluded as regards any defects which the sample would disclose to a buyer of ordinary diligence and experience" (f).

(3) As to Manufacture.—The Court of Appeal has decided, in Johnson v. Raylton (g), that under a contract for the sale of goods by a manufacturer of such goods, who is not otherwise a dealer in them, the latter is bound to supply goods of his own manufacture. The plaintiffs, who were manufacturers of, and not dealers in, iron plates, contracted to sell to the defendants 2,000 tons of ship plates of a certain quality. They tendered plates which, it was admitted, were substantially as good as if manufactured by the plaintiffs themselves. Nevertheless the Court held (Bramwell, L. J., dissenting) that the defendants were not bound to take delivery. "I am of opinion," said Cotton, L. J., "that when a purchaser orders goods from a firm which is a manufacturer only of such goods, not a dealer in them, then, unless it is shown that in the particular trade, or as regards the particular goods, there is a practice or usage for the manufacturer to supply the goods of other makers, the purchaser must be assumed to have contracted with the particular manufacturers, in reliance on the general excellence of the work of their firm, and is entitled, in the absence of any express stipulation to the contrary, to have, in performance of the contract, goods of the manufacturer's own make" (h).

"On the sale, or in the contract for the sale, of any goods to which a trade mark, or mark or trade description, has been applied, the vendor shall be deemed to warrant that the mark is a genuine trade mark, and not forged or falsely applied, or that the trade description is not a false trade description within the meaning of this Act, unless the contrary is expressed in some writing signed by or on behalf of the vendor, and delivered at the time of the sale or contract to, and accepted by, the vendee."

(4) As to Title.—In contracts of sale there appears to be, though the question has been much controverted, an implied warranty of title, not only in the case of executory contracts of sale, but also in the case of sales of specific articles. In Morley v. Attenborough (k), Parke, B., stated that the old authorities seem to show that there is no such condition. This view is, however, open to doubt, and Mr. Benjamin appears to be justified in saying (l), that "a sale of personal chattels implies an affirmation by the vendor that the chattel is his, and therefore he warrants the title, unless it be shown by the facts and circumstances of the sale that the vendor did not intend to assert ownership, but only to transfer such interest as he might have in the chattel sold." In Raphael & Sons v. Burt & Co. (m), Stephen, J., expressed approval of the rule as thus laid down. The rule obviously does not extend to cases where the sale of goods is not by the vendor as owner; as where a pawnbroker sells unredeemed pledges, or a sheriff sells under an execution (n).

Express Warranties.

Every affirmation at the time (o) of sale of personal chattels is a warranty, provided it appear to have been so intended (p). But a warranty after the sale is void, unless supported by a fresh consideration (q). If the vendor affirm at the time of sale that the goods are his, that amounts to a warranty of his title (r); but no oral allegation previously to a sale by written contract can possibly operate as a warranty, for the writing is the only evidence of the contract (s).

A distinction exists between a breach of warranty and a failure to perform a condition, or a total failure of consideration by the delivery of an entirely different and worthless article instead of that contracted for, in which latter case the consideration money may be recovered back again (t). Thus, in Azémar v. Casella (u), the contract was to supply cotton warranted equal to a sample of "long-staple Salem" cotton. The cotton actually tendered was Western Madras cotton, inferior in quality to "long-staple Salem," and requiring different machinery for its manufacture. It was held, that the purchasers were not bound to accept the cotton tendered, though the contract provided for an allowance in price if the cotton proved inferior in quality to the sample.

Where the vendor of specific goods has bound himself by a warranty, either express or implied, the vendee may use the breach of that warranty as evidence in reduction of the vendor's claim for compensation, or may bring an action thereon against him (x). But he cannot, if he have accepted the article, return it and recover the price as money paid on a consideration which has failed, unless there were a condition in the contract authorising such return, or the vendor have received back the chattel, and thereby consented to rescind the contract, or been guilty of a fraud, which destroys the contract altogether (y). The vendee cannot by his own act alone, unless in the excepted cases above mentioned, re-vest the property in the seller and recover the price when paid on the ground of total failure of consideration; and it follows that he cannot by the same means protect himself from payment of the price on the same ground (z).

Though the vendee of a specific chattel delivered with a warranty has no right to return it in case of non-compliance with the warranty, the same reason does not apply to cases of executory contracts; where an article, for instance, is ordered from a manufacturer, who engages that it shall be of a certain quality or fit for a certain purpose, and the article sent as such is never completely accepted by the party ordering it. In this and similar cases the vendor's obligation is a condition precedent to any obligation by the vendee under the contract (a). The latter may return the article as soon as he discovers the defect, provided he has done nothing more in the meantime than was necessary to give it a fair trial (b), or has returned it within the time provided for in the contract (c); nor would the purchaser of a commodity to be afterwards delivered according to sample be precluded from returning the bulk, if not in accordance with the sample, within a reasonable time for examination and comparison (d). But in no case can a purchaser return a chattel where he has done more than is consistent with the purpose of trial, e. g., where he has re-sold it at a profit, and delayed his offer to return it till it has come for a second time into his possession (e).

Duties of vendor.

It has been laid down by some writers of authority that a future event cannot be warranted, as that a horse shall be sound two years hence (f). This doctrine is, however, overruled (g). It is also laid down by the older books that defects apparent at the time of a bargain are not included in a warranty however general, because they can form no subject of deceit and fraud, haud enim decipitur qui scit se decipi; and originally the mode of proceeding on a breach of warranty was by an action of deceit grounded on a supposed fraud. A party, therefore, who should buy a horse knowing it to be blind of both eyes, could not sue for that defect on a general warranty of soundness. Thus, where the horse had a splint, which was known to both parties, in an action on a warranty of soundness, wind and limb, it was held that the proper direction to the jury would be to consider whether the horse was at the time of the bargain sound, wind and limb, saving those manifest defects contemplated by the parties (h). On a new trial of the same cause, it appeared that some splints cause lameness and others not, and the Court then thought that as the consequences of a splint cannot be apparent at the time of sale, like the loss of an eye, or any visible blemish or defect, the vendor must have meant to warrant that this was not such a splint as would occasion subsequent unsoundness, and the horse having gone lame in consequence of it, the vendee was held entitled to recover (i).

A warranty, like any other contract, may of course be limited and moulded according to the intention of the parties. Thus, it may be confined in point of duration, as where a board was fixed upon the wall of a repository containing certain rules, one of which was, that warranties given with horses sold by auction there should remain in force only till twelve the next day, and then terminate unless a surgeon's certificate of the horse's unsoundness were in the meantime given. It was held that this regulation was binding upon purchasers (k). In Hinchcliffe v. Barwick (l), a horse was sold with a warranty that it was a "good worker," and subject to a condition that "horses not answering such warranty must be returned before 5 o'clock of the day of the sale." The plaintiff brought an action for breach of warranty, and it was held that, in the absence of fraud, the purchaser could not maintain the action; his only remedy was to return the horse within the specified time.

We have seen that every affirmation at the time of sale of a personal chattel is a warranty, provided it appear to have been so intended, and provided the contract be not written and the affirmation merely oral. Where the article is sold by description merely (m), and the allegations of the vendor, whether oral or contained in a written document (n), do not amount to a warranty, but merely to representations, which afterwards turn out not to be consistent with fact, if such representations were made honestly according to his belief at the time, no action lies against him (o). But it is otherwise if he knows that he is representing a falsehood (p): in such case the vendee (q) may maintain an action for the deceit, in which he must allege a scienter and show that the description was false within the knowledge of the seller (r), or made without knowledge whether it was true or false (s). In equity—the rules of which are, in case of difference, binding—"it was not necessary, in order to set aside a contract obtained by material false represensation, to prove that the party who obtained it knew at the time when the representation was made that it was false. It was put in two ways, either of which was sufficient. One way of putting the case was: 'A man is not allowed to get a benefit from a statement which he now admits to be false. He is not to be allowed to say, for the purpose of civil jurisdiction, that when he made it he did not know it to be false; he ought to have found out that before he made it.' The other way of putting it was this: 'Even assuming that moral fraud must be shown in order to set aside a contract, you have it where a man having obtained a beneficial contract by a statement which he now knows to be false, insists upon keeping that contract. To do so is a moral delinquency; no man ought to seek to take advantage of his own false statements'" (t).

Duties of vendee.

The duties incumbent on the vendee are, first, to accept the goods; and, secondly, to pay for them.

If he refuse to accept them, the vendor, having performed all conditions precedent on his part, may sue him, either specially on his contract (x) or (if the property have passed to the vendee) for goods bargained and sold; in which latter form of action he will recover his entire price, while in the special form he will recover but the amount of damage actually sustained by him (y).

If the goods are to be delivered at a stipulated place, the vendor before suing for the price must tender them there (z), unless indeed the vendee has refused or put it out of his own power to complete his contract. If there be no stipulated place, it is the vendee's business to fetch them (a). Where the goods are to be forwarded by a carrier, the vendor must enter them, so that the carrier may be responsible for their value if lost (b).

If the goods were to be of a particular description, they must be, as has been stated, such as correspond with that description (c), e. g., with the sample, if they were sold by sample (d), in which case the vendee has a right to inspect and compare before accepting them, and may, if prevented from doing so, rescind the contract (e). The measure of this damage is the difference between the contract price and the market price on the day of tendering the goods for acceptance: Phillpotts v. Evans, 5 M. & W. 475. Per Tindal, C. J., in Barrow v. Arnaud, 8 Q. B. at p. 610; or (where the vendee has refused to receive them) on the days agreed for delivery: Ogle v. Vane, L. R. 3 Q. B. 272; Brown v. Muller, L. (z) In some cases this is merely for the benefit of the vendor, and then it forms no condition precedent: Neill v. Whitworth (cotton to be taken from the quay), 18 C. B. N. S. 435; L. R. 1 C. P. 684.

with the sample, he has the right promptly to reject and require the vendor to remove them (f); but he must exercise this right within a reasonable time, and without dealing with the property as his own, which would amount to an acceptance (g). In order to prevent the danger arising from variance between the article and the description given of it in the conditions of sale, it is usual in sales by auction of important matters, such as real property, to insert a clause, that mistakes in description shall not vitiate the sale, but only entitle the vendee to a compensation. But even this clause will not help if there be a variance in any essential particular (h).

It is said that if a purchaser order several things at the same time he may consider the contract as entire, and object to receive some of them without the rest (i); but that if he accept one singly, he severs the contract and cannot object to receiving another singly (k). Where different lots are bought by the same person at the same auction, the purchase of each is a distinct contract (l).

As fraud renders voidable every contract, it will be a sufficient excuse for the vendee's non-performance of his, that the vendor was guilty of fraud (m); as, e.g., by employing puffers at an auction to enhance the price without giving notice of his intention to do so (n), though possibly there might be a difference if the intent were not to enhance the price generally, but only to prevent the goods from going off at an undervalue (o). And it is clear that the employment of anyone to bid vitiates a sale advertised to be without reserve (p). So, if the vendor fraudulently conceal what he ought to communicate; as, for example, by giving a partial and fragmentary account which is misleading (q), or give a false description of the goods, e.g., by calling them the property of a gentleman deceased, and sold by order of his executor (r). And though an article be sold with all faults, yet artifice used by the vendor to disguise vitiates the sale (s); but it is not so clear whether his knowledge of the faults will, if he use no artifice, have that effect (t), and the passive acquiescence of the seller in the self-deception of the buyer does not entitle the latter to avoid the contract (u). It seems that if the vendee knew a misdescription to be such, he cannot avoid the sale on account of it (x); haud enim decipitur qui scit se decipi.

Duties of vendee.

Though a vendor who has been imposed upon has in every case a right to repudiate the contract, and may, if he have paid his money, recover it back from the seller, yet he must elect to avoid the contract as soon as he discovers the fraud, and if he lie by and treat the property as his own, he will be considered as having elected to confirm the transaction, and that even though he subsequently has discovered a new incident in the fraud; for that does not give him a new right to rescind, but merely strengthens the evidence of the vendor's dishonesty (y).

It was once said that the vendor cannot maintain an action on his contract to sell and deliver at a future day goods which, at the time of so contracting, he had not in his possession, had not contracted to buy, and had no expectation of receiving by consignment—such a transaction amounting to a wager on the price (z). This doctrine is, however, overruled (a).

If the goods have been delivered, and the vendee after that neglect to pay the price, the vendor may recover it in an action for goods sold and delivered (b). But he cannot recover in contract before the time of credit, if there be one, has expired, although the fraud of the defendant be such as would entitle him to rescind the contract and bring trover for the goods immediately (c), unless a rescission of the contract can be inferred from the circumstances (d).

Duties of vendee.

It sometimes happens that there is such a difference between the goods delivered and their description in the bargain as would have justified the vendee in refusing to receive them, notwithstanding which he has taken them into his possession and made use of them. In such a case his conduct would be taken to amount to a confession that the vendor had performed his contract and that he would be obliged to pay the whole price stipulated (e). And where the vendee had expressly stipulated that they should be returned if not approved of, his keeping them for an unreasonable time precluded him from doing so (f). "Where a party desires to rescind a purchase upon the ground that the quality of the goods does not correspond with the sample, it is his duty to make a distinct offer to return, or in fact to return, the goods by stating to the vendor that the goods are at his risk" (g). But there are some cases in which it would be impossible or very difficult to return the goods; for instance, where they consist of bricks and timbers put together in the shape of a building, or the breach of contract may not have been discovered till the articles have been received and used by the vendee. In such a case the vendee may, in the action by the vendor, set up the defective quality as a defence, or by way of counterclaim, if consequential damages be sought (h). The vendor cannot recover more than the value of the benefit which the vendee has actually derived, and therefore, where there has been no benefit derived, shall recover nothing at all (i). And this rule holds, even when the vendee's complaint is, that the vendor has not complied with an express warranty (k); as, for instance, that a horse is sound, in which case it is clear that no acceptance of the goods can amount to a conclusive recognition that the vendor has performed his contract (though a presumption to that effect may arise from long silence on the part of the vendee (l)), and the vendee may counterclaim upon the warranty (m).

A question has sometimes arisen whether a vendee who has refused to accept goods on the ground that they do not correspond with the order or sample, can justify selling them as the vendor's agent in order to avoid the expense of export (n). It is a dangerous course to pursue, and never ought to be resorted to without necessity. The better course is to give the vendor notice that they are rejected, and require him to remove them (o).

Where goods are sold without an express stipulation as to price (p), the vendor has a right to receive as much as they are, on a reasonable estimation, worth, even although the contract may be one which it was necessary to reduce to writing in order to satisfy the Statute of Frauds (q). In the absence of proof as to their value, it is presumed, it has been said, that they were of the lowest price of goods of that description; unless the vendee have himself suppressed the means of ascertaining the truth, for then a contrary presumption arises (r).

Either party may of course excuse himself from the performance of his contract by showing that it is illegal, as where the goods were drugs, sold to a brewer to be used in his brewery (s), or libellous and obscene prints (t), or dress furnished for the express purpose of prostitution (u); nor is it necessarily an excuse that the parties thought they were acting legally (x).

"We agree," said Blackburn, J., in Waugh v. Morris (y), "that where a contract is to do a thing which cannot be performed without a violation of the law, it is void, whether the parties knew the law or not. But we think that in order to avoid a contract which can be legally performed, on the ground that there was an intention to perform it in an illegal manner, it is necessary to show that there was the wicked intention to break the law."

A distinction was drawn between cases in which the contract violates a law designed for the protection of the public, and those in which it violates a law merely designed for the protection of the revenue, and it has been said that in the former cases only is the contract void (z). But this distinction is now repudiated.

"It may be safely laid down," says Parke, B., delivering judgment in Cope v. Rowlands (a), "notwithstanding some dicta apparently to the contrary, that, if the contract be rendered illegal, it can make no difference in point of law whether the statute which makes it so has in view the protection of the revenue or any other object. The sole question is, whether the statute means to prohibit the contract."

Illegality of contract an excuse for non-performance by either party.

The true rule is that laid down by Lord Tenterden in Wetherell v. Jones (b). His lordship there says,—

"Where a contract, which a party seeks to enforce, is expressly, or by implication (c), forbidden by the statute or common law, no court will lend its assistance to give it effect; and there are numerous cases in the books, where an action on the contract has failed, because either the consideration for the promise or the act to be done was illegal, as being against the express provisions of the law, or contrary to justice, morality, and sound policy. But where the consideration and the matter to be performed are both legal, we are not aware that a plaintiff has ever been precluded from recovering, by an infringement of the law, not contemplated by the contract, in the performance of something to be done on his part."

Therefore, in that case, a rectifier, having, contrary to stat. 6 Geo. 4, c. 80, ss. 115, 117, sold spirits without a permit expressing their true strength, was allowed to maintain an action for the price (d). For a full treatment of this subject the reader must be referred to works on the law of contract, especially Mr. Leake's, and Sir W. Anson's.

By stat. 29 Car. 2, c. 7 (e), "no tradesman, artificer, workman, labourer, or other person whatsoever, shall do or execute any worldly labour, business or work of their ordinary callings, works of necessity and charity only excepted, and no person whatsoever shall publicly cry, show forth, or expose to sale any wares, merchandizes, fruit, herbs, goods or chattels upon the Lord's day." It has been held, since this Act, that the sale of a horse on Sunday, not being within the plaintiff's ordinary calling, is not void (f); contrà where it is so (g); the statute prohibiting only work done in a man's ordinary call- ing (h). It has been said, too, that a contract of sale is not void against a person ignorant that the vendor was exercising his ordinary calling (i); but this is questionable (k). And where a heifer was sold on Sunday, and the vendee retained, and on a subsequent day promised to pay for it, he was held liable upon his subsequent promise (l). The Act applies only to persons ejusdem generis with those mentioned in it (m).

Illegality of contract an excuse for non-performance by either party.

By 7 Geo. 2, c. 8, entitled, "An Act to prevent the nefarious practice of Stockjobbing," a large class of speculative bargains on the Stock Exchange were declared void and prohibited under heavy penalties. This Act, however, has been repealed (n). Such transactions, therefore, are no longer illegal. Still, if no contract of sale be intended by either of the parties to the bargain for the sale and purchase of the stocks, or if there be an arrangement that such contract will not be carried out (o), it will fall within the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, which, by sect. 18, enacts "that all contracts or agreements, whether by parol or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void" (p). But, as we have seen, where a broker is employed to speculate for a client upon the Stock Exchange by buying and selling stocks from and to jobbers, the employment is not within this enactment, and the broker is entitled to be indemnified by the client against losses, although there was an understanding between the client and the broker that the latter would endeavour to so arrange that differences only should be paid by the client (q). A sale even of goods by way of a wager would be void (r).

A sale may be void for contravening the enactments of the Legislature which aim at the establishment of uniformity of weights and measures (s). The principal Acts now in force on this subject are the Weights and Measures Acts, 1878 and 1889 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 49, and 52 & 53 Vict. c. 21), which consolidate the laws relating to weights and measures (t). By sect. 19, every contract, bargain, sale or dealing made or had in the United Kingdom for work, goods, wares or merchandise to be done, sold, delivered, carried or agreed for by weight or measure, shall be void unless made and had according to one of the weights or measures ascertained by the Act, or to some multiple or part thereof. This provision does not apply, unless the goods are to be weighed or measured in this country; consequently, a contract made here for goods which are to be delivered abroad, according to a foreign measure, is perfectly valid (u). The Act permits the use of the metric system of weights and measures, and of decimal sub-divisions of imperial weights and measures, whether metric or otherwise (x).

CHAPTER XIII.

CONTRACTS OF DEBT (a).

SECT. 1. Definition.
2. Duty of Debtor.
3. Duty of Creditor.

SECTION 1.—Definition.

Definition.

A CONTRACT of debt is defined by Sir William Blackstone to be that whereby a chose in action, or right to a certain sum of money, is mutually acquired and lost. He remarks that it may arise from any of the other contracts; as, in case of sale, if the price be not paid in ready money, the vendee becomes indebted for its amount to the vendor, and the vendor has the property in his price, as a chose in action, by means of this contract of debt. Any contract, in short, whereby a determinate sum of money becomes due to any person, and is not paid, but remains in action merely, is a contract of debt (b).

Sums which are paid to the credit of a customer with a banker, though usually called deposits, are in truth loans by the customer to the banker (c).

(a) This chapter deals with a part of the general subject of performance of contracts. The title "Contract of Debt" has been retained; but the chapter includes much more than that contract, strictly speaking.

A common evidence of loan is what is called an I O U. It requires no stamp, and is primâ facie evidence of a loan to the party who signs from him who produces it: Douglas v. Holme, 12 Ad. & E. 641. See Lemere v. Elliott, 6 H. & N. 656; and Hinton v. Sparkes, L. R. 3 C. P. 161.

Section II.—Duty of Debtor.

Duty of debtor.

The parties to this contract are called debtor and creditor; the debtor's duty under it is, to tender payment to the creditor or his agent at the proper place and time, i.e., generally speaking, before demand made (d), or action brought against him (e); but if, as in the case of a bill, there be a day specially fixed for payment, then at that day (f), in the proper mode, and to the proper amount;—the creditor's, to receive it, and make him a proper acquittance.

First. Mode of payment.—Where the creditor has himself chalked out the mode of payment, it will be sufficient to follow his directions. Thus, where he desires that a bill or note may be remitted by the post, if it be lost, the loss will fall on him (g). If the creditor and debtor meet and balance their account, by deducting the debt out of some other demand by the debtor against the creditor, such a transaction is equivalent to actual payment (h). So is an agreement that goods furnished by the debtor shall go in satisfaction of the debt (i); so, too, is a payment, accepted by the creditor, by bonds representing at the time money's worth, though they afterwards become worthless (k). By the Rules of the Supreme Court, Ord. 45, r. 7, payment by a garnishee, or execution levied upon him, is a valid discharge to him to the amount paid or levied (l).

Duty of debtor.

Payment to an agent by way of set off will not amount to payment to the principal; the mode of payment must be in accordance with the agent's authority (m).

In the absence of directions from the creditor there must, to constitute a legal tender of the debt, be an actual production and offer of the sum due, unless the creditor dispense with it by a declaration that he will not accept it (n). This tender must be of money, if beyond 40*s.* in gold (o), or in what has been rendered by Act of Parliament equivalent to money for that purpose, viz., notes of the Bank of England payable to bearer on demand, which are a legal tender for any sum above five pounds, except at the Bank itself and its branches (p). Although, strictly speaking, a legal tender must be made in money if required, a tender of country bank notes, if not objected to on that account, will be sufficient (q). The tender of a larger sum than that due is legal (r); but a tender of a larger sum requiring change, is not so (s); nor is a tender good if accompanied by a condition (t), as that a document shall be given up to be cancelled, or a receipt in full, or even a stamped receipt (u) given, or that it shall be received as all that is due (x). debtor giving a receipt, if objected to on that account, has been held not to be a good tender (y). Now, however, by the Stamp Act, 1870, upon the payment of a sum amounting to 2*l.*, a receipt duly stamped must be given to the person paying under a penalty of 10*l.* for refusal to do so (z). And it is a general rule, that a tender shall not be in terms which would compel the creditor to make an admission: thus, "I tender you 21*l. in payment of the half-year's rent due at Lady-day last*," is a bad tender (a). But, "I am come with the amount of your bill" (b), accompanied by the production of the money, or an offer to pay "under protest" (c), has been held sufficient. Some of these cases are not very easily reconcileable inter se, if the particular facts only be looked at. The principle, however, that a tender must be unconditional, is recognised in all of them. The observations of the Court of Queen's Bench in Henwood v. Oliver (d), and in the later case of Bowen v. Owen (d), seem certainly more in accordance with that which the understanding of a man of business, unembarrassed with legal distinctions, would suggest, than some of the decisions at Nisi Prius above referred to.

"The defendant," said Mr. Justice Patteson, in the former case, "who makes a tender always means that the amount tendered, though less than the plaintiff's bill, is all he is entitled to demand in respect of it. How, then, would the plaintiff preclude himself from recovering more, by accepting an offer of part, accompanied by expressions which are implied in every tender? Expressio eorum quæ tacité insunt nihil operatur."

At the same time it must be observed that, in the very case then before the Court, if the creditor had accepted the money offered in the terms there used, "I am come with the amount of your bill," he would have found it difficult, afterwards, to persuade a jury that he had not admitted it to be truly what it was called, "the amount of his bill." It is true, he might have guarded himself by saying, "I am willing to take it, but my claim on account of my bill is larger"; but to require him to do that, would be to shift the onus of keeping clear of words implying an admission from the debtor to the creditor.

However, if the creditor refuse to receive the money on some other account, ex. gr., on the ground that more is due to him, and do not object to the informality of the tender, that will in general cure such informality (e); but though an informal offer of the money may be thus available, yet there must be an offer (f).

A tender to an authorised agent is a tender to his principal (g). If, however, at the time of the tender the person to whom it is made, and who would otherwise be presumed to be authorised, distinctly disclaims authority to receive it, the tender is made at the peril of him who makes it. Should it turn out that the person to whom it was made had in truth no authority to receive the money, the tender will be bad (h). A tender to one of several joint creditors is a tender to all (i).

Payment of a less sum than the amount of a debt is not a satisfaction of the debt, even though it be paid and received at the time in satisfaction of the larger sum (k), unless there be an acquittance under seal (l), or unless there be some consideration for the agreement to receive the smaller sum. Thus, a negotiable instrument, so given and taken, may operate as a satisfaction of a debt of a larger amount, not due upon an instrument of the same sort; the negotiability of the instrument is regarded as consideration for the agreement of the creditor to receive it in satisfaction (m). So, of a cheque for a smaller amount of a third person, even though he be the solicitor of the debtor (n). So where an agreement is entered into between a number of creditors and a debtor, to accept a composition of a smaller amount in satisfaction of their debts, if the debtor duly performs his part of the agreement, the debts are discharged, the agreement of the other creditors to forego a part of their debt affording a consideration for the agreement of each creditor to that effect (o).

A creditor who receives from his debtor a negotiable instrument or a cheque, or something other than money, in full discharge cannot, in general, treat the payment as "on account"; he must either accept in accordance with the debtor's intentions, or return it. But this is not a necessary inference, and the Courts appear disposed to deal with each case as it arises. In Ackroyd v. Smithies (p), the Court thought that the fact that a debtor who had sent a cheque in full discharge, and afterwards sent another cheque, was evidence that the debtor assented to the treatment of the first cheque by the creditor as being sent on account. But the question is one of fact; the Court of Appeal lately declined to hold as matter of law that the keeping of a cheque sent in satisfaction of a claim for a large amount, amounted to accord and satisfaction (q).

It has been questioned whether there can be a good tender of part of a debt so as to protect the debtor from an action for that part, if it turn out that more was due, and the creditor objected to the tender of the part upon that ground. The earlier decisions seem to be at variance on this point (r); but it has since been held (s) that the true distinction is between a demand severable into parts, and an entire demand, such as that in Cotton v.

Godwin (t), where the debt was a promissory note. The person tendering must be ready and willing to perform (u).

Although, as we have seen, there can be no legal tender except of cash or its equivalent, payment (x) is often, by mutual consent, made in a bill or note. The taking of this amounts to an agreement to give the debtor credit for the time it has to run, and suspend the creditor's remedy in the meanwhile (y), except in cases where the debt is also secured by a specialty (z), or is otherwise of higher degree than simple contract, as, for instance, if it be due on account of rent (a). Still a bill or note may, by mutual agreement, operate as immediate payment (b); and the transferable note of the debtor himself may be taken in discharge of a liquidated debt of a greater amount (c). It is, however, in general, no satisfaction of any debt or demand for which it has been given (d), but only primâ facie evidence of payment, rendering it necessary that the creditor should account for it before he can be entitled to recover the consideration (e).

But see Mercer v. Cheese, 4 M. & G. 804.

(e) Per Pollock, C. B., Griffith v. Owen, 13 M. & W. at p. 64; Caine v. Coulton, supra.

Duty of debtor.

Although, generally speaking, the bill or note is no satisfaction, it will operate as such if the debtor's liability (f) upon it be discharged by its loss (g), or by the holder's laches (h) or folly, as if he alter it so as to discharge the parties thereto (i); or if the creditor agree to receive it as cash and take upon himself the risk of its being paid (k), or if it were transferred to him by way of sale (l).

If the creditor negotiate the bill or note for value, and without rendering himself liable, it will, though dishonoured, operate as payment, and the vendor's lien will not revive. Therefore, in Bunney v. Poyntz (m), where the agent of a vendor took the notes of the vendee and another for the price, discounted them with his banker and indorsed them, but the vendor, his employer, did not indorse them, the Court held, that the vendor must be considered as having received payment for his goods, and could not retain them, though his agent afterwards became bankrupt, and the notes were dishonoured. But if the creditor negotiate the bill or note so as to render himself personally liable upon it, in that case it will not operate as payment if dishonoured. Thus, in Miles v. Gorton (n), where the vendee of some hops accepted a bill for the price which the vendor drew, and afterwards indorsed and negotiated, it was held that, on the vendee becoming bankrupt, and the bill being dishonoured, the vendor's lien on the hops revived. To the like effect is the case of Gunn v. Bolckow & Co. (o). The defendants had sold iron rails to the A. Company, payment to be made by buyer's acceptances. As the wharfingers' certificates were delivered, the A. Company accepted the drafts of the defendants, which the latter negotiated. The A. Company becoming insolvent, and the bills not being met, the Court of Appeal held that the defendants' lien as unpaid vendors revived. The reason of this distinction appears to be, that, in the former case, the vendor has obtained value for the instrument, which value he cannot be compelled to refund, and would, therefore, be paid twice, if permitted to recover the price of the goods. But, in the latter case, he is, as an indorser, compellable to refund the value he has received. And I conceive that, on the same principle, if, instead of indorsing the instrument, he were to give it in payment for other goods, inasmuch as, on its dishonour, his liability for those second goods would revive, so also would his right to sue for the price of his own goods if delivered, or to retain them, if in his possession and not delivered. However, in this latter case, which was the case in Miles v. Gorton (n), till he has actually taken up the bill or paid for the other goods, it is uncertain whether the bill will prove valuable to him or not; and it seems, therefore, that he ought not to be allowed to sue for the price of his own goods till that uncertainty has been determined (p), though, if he have them in his hands, he may retain his lien on them, as in Miles v. Gorton (q). In Tarleton v. Allhusen (r), the doctrine just laid down was carried a step further, and it was held, that when the vendor took a bill, and indorsed it to B. & Co., who sued the acceptor and obtained judgment, but did not sue out execution, and the vendor afterwards took up the bill, he was not to be considered paid for his goods, upon the principle laid down before in this Book, Chap. I., viz., that judgment is not per se a satisfaction.

But it is conceived that the circumstance of third persons being liable would not affect the matter, if the vendors were liable.

Duty of debtor.

In one case, payment by the delivery to the bankrupt of his own dishonoured acceptance was held sufficient (s); but that seems to have proceeded on the ground that the bankrupt's conduct amounted to an assent to receive it as cash, otherwise it would be difficult to reconcile the case with Hough v. May (t).

If payment is to be made by a bill payable at a certain period, the creditor cannot, even if the bill be not delivered according to agreement, commence an action on the consideration till the expiration of that period, though he may sue in the meantime upon the special contract, and complain of the non-delivery of the bill in conformity thereto (u). Where goods were sold at six months' credit, payment then to be made by a bill at two or three months, this was considered in effect a nine months' credit (x).

By the civil law, payment by whomever made liberated the debtor—"Nec interest creditori quis solvat, utrum is qui debet an alius pro eo; liberatur enim et alio solvente, sive sciente sive ignorante debitore, solutio vel invito eo fiat." It would appear that by the law of England, if payment be made by a stranger for or on account of the debtor, and the latter choose to adopt it while the creditor retains the money, the payment is good (y).

There may be discharge by novation, that is, a new contract may be entered into with intent to dissolve a former contract. The acceptance of the new liability will be good consideration for giving up rights under the first contract (a). Where a debtor gives to his creditor a draft or order on a debtor of the former, and the creditor together with the debtor assents to the substitution, and the original debt is discharged (b), there may be discharge by expromission, that is, the substitution with his assent of a new debtor (c). So far as insurance companies are concerned, the matter is regulated by 35 & 36 Vict. c. 41, s. 7, which declares—

"Where a company, either before or after the passing of this Act, has transferred its business to or been amalgamated with another company, no policy-holder in the first-mentioned company who shall pay to the other company the premiums accruing due in respect of his policy shall by reason of any such payment made after the passing of this Act, or by reason of any other act done after the passing of this Act, be deemed to have abandoned any claim which he would have had against the first-mentioned company on due payment of premiums to such company, or to have accepted in lieu thereof the liability of the other company, unless such abandonment and acceptance have been signified by some writing signed by him or by his agent lawfully authorized."

"(1.) When the holder of a bill at or after its maturity absolutely and unconditionally renounces his rights against the acceptor, the bill is discharged. The renunciation must be in writing unless the bill is delivered up to the acceptor.

Amount of Payment—Interest.—The amount of the sum due to the creditor is frequently, between the time of contract and that of payment, increased by the addition of Interest. Interest is, and always was, payable where there has been a contract to that effect, express, or to be implied from circumstances, the usage of trade (d), or the mode of dealing between the parties (e); and also upon a bond, bill, or promissory note (f).

In most other cases, there was a considerable dispute upon the question of interest, and the leaning of the Courts seemed on the whole against allowing it. However, by stat. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, it was enacted—

Sect. 28. "Upon all debts or sums certain, payable at a certain time or otherwise, the jury, on the trial of any issue or inquisition of damages, may, if they shall think fit, allow interest to the creditor, at a rate not exceeding the current rate of interest, from the time when such debts or sums certain were payable, if such debts or sums be payable by virtue of some written instrument at a certain time; or, if payable otherwise, then from the time when demand of payment (g) shall have been made in writing, so as such demand shall give notice to the debtor that interest will be claimed from the date of such demand until the term of payment, provided that interest shall be payable in all cases in which it is now payable by law" (h).

Order LVIII. r. 19, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, provides as follows:—

"On an appeal from the High Court, interest for such time as execution has been delayed by the appeal shall be allowed, unless the Court or a judge otherwise orders; and the taxing officer may compute such interest without any order for that purpose."

By sect. 17 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, all judgment debts carry interest at four per cent., for which, as well as for the principal, execution may issue.

Compound Interest, i.e., interest on a balance of account, debiting the debtor with former interest, is allowable where there is a contract to that effect, either express or to be collected from circumstances, as where the parties had been in the habit of dealing on those terms (k), or a banker's customer knew it to be the practice of the house (l), but not otherwise (m).

Usury.—The various laws relating to this subject were all repealed by the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 90 (n), save so far as they affected transactions prior to the 10th day of August, 1854.

Appropriation of Payments.—It frequently happens, that a party who pays money is indebted in several ways to the party who receives it from him; in such cases it becomes a question, to the reduction of which of his debts the payment must be applied. The rule is, that the party paying has power to make the application at the time of payment (o), which he may do either by express words, or a conduct indicative of his intention (p); but that, if he neglect to make it, the party receiving may (q), and is not bound to make an immediate application (r); and though it was once said that perhaps he ought to make one within a reasonable time (s), it seems now pretty well established that he may make it at any time before the matter comes to the consideration of a jury (t).

When there is an account current between the parties, ex. gr., a banking account, the law, in the absence of any other specific arrangement, or course of dealing between the parties, presumes that they intended to apply the first item on the credit side to the first item on the debit side, and so on (u).

The following rule may be useful in ascertaining the intention with which any particular payment was made and received, and the mode in which it ought to be applied: "Where a creditor receives, without objection, what is offered by his debtor, solvitur in modum solventis. Where the creditor objects, recipitur in modum recipientis."—Per Tindal, C. J., Webb v. Weatherby, 1 Bing. N. C. at p. 505; Croft v. Lumley, 5 E. & B. 648.

law of England, the debtor may, in the first instance, appropriate the payment—solvitur in modum solventis; if he omit to do so, the creditor may make the appropriation—recipitur in modum recipientis; but if neither make any appropriation, the law appropriates the payment to the earlier debt." And, accordingly, in that case it was held, that the debtor having made no appropriation at the time of payment, the creditor had a right to appropriate a payment made generally to a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations (y). Nay, in one case it was decided that a solicitor who had done work for a corporation without a retainer under seal, might appropriate a general payment to the work so done; though the Court held at the same time that he could not have recovered payment in an action (z). Where there are distinct demands, one against a firm, and the other against one only of the partners, if the money paid be the money of the partners, and be not specifically appropriated by the payer, the creditor must not, and the law will not, apply it to the demand upon the individual; for that would be to pay the debt of one with the money of others (a). Nor will the rule apply where a trustee, who has paid in trust money to his own private account at his bankers, draws out sums by cheques generally; he will be taken to have drawn out his own money. A trustee cannot be heard to say that he took away the trust money when he had a right to take away his own money (b). Nor will an appropriation be allowed, which would deprive the party paying of a benefit, such as the taxation of costs; and, therefore, a solicitor cannot apply a general payment to the taxable items of his bill only (c). If some of the demands be illegal, a general payment will be applied to the legal demands (d); but where an Act of Parliament does not render a particular species of contract illegal, but only prohibits the enforcement of it by action, there a creditor may appropriate a general payment to a demand arising out of such a contract (e). Where the same broker sold goods of A. and goods of B. to the payer, a general payment, if insufficient to discharge both debts, must be applied proportionably to them both (f). The rule in Clayton's case (g) presupposes the existence of an unbroken account, and payments made in that account; it does not apply where payments are made to a new and distinct account (h). An intention on the part of the debtor to appropriate to a particular debt is, perhaps, more easily presumed in favour of a surety, where there are any circumstances which can be considered indicative thereof (i); but in the absence of a contract, express or implied, the mere existence of the relation of principal and surety does not take away the right of the payee to appropriate payments in accordance with the rule in Clayton's case (k). Where a partner dies and the partnership is in debt, and the surviving partners continue to deal with a creditor who joins the transactions of the old and new firms in one account, the payments made by the surviving partners must be applied to the old debt (l).

Section III.—Duty of Creditor.

Duty of creditor.

The duty of the creditor is to receive the payment, if tendered at the proper time, and give a proper acquittance. The consequence of his refusing payment when tendered will be, that if he afterwards commence an action for the amount, the tender, accompanied by a payment of the sum tendered into Court, will be a good defence, unless the creditor can prove a prior or subsequent demand and refusal (m). Such a tender, moreover, will prevent interest from afterwards running against the debtor (n).

(n) Dent v. Dunn, 3 Camp. 296. See Hume v. Peploe, 8 East, 168.

Duty of creditor.

As to Acquittance.—It seems doubtful whether the debtor had, at common law, a right to demand a receipt on payment, excepting from the King's receiver (o). However, by 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, s. 123, if a person refuses to give a receipt duly stamped, in any case where it would be liable to duty, he shall forfeit the sum of 10*l.* (p).

A receipt, though strong, is not conclusive evidence of payment (q), unless it be by deed; for then, in the absence of fraud, the law admits no evidence to the contrary (r). A receipt in full of all demands is an admission of great weight, and it has even been said, that, in the absence of mistake, it is conclusive (s). But this doctrine is incapable of being supported, and we may venture to assume that it must, like other matters not amounting to estoppel, be used as evidence to be submitted to the jury, and is capable of being rebutted (t). All receipts for or upon the payment of money amounting to 2*l.* or upwards, now (u) bear one uniform duty of 1*d.*, for which adhesive stamps may be used, which the creditor must cancel. The former exception of bankers' accountable receipts given to their customers still exists, qualified by the proviso, that the money is expressed to be received from the person to whom it is to be accounted for. Receipts requiring a stamp cannot be stamped after they have been written, except within fourteen days, on payment of the duty and 5*l.*; or one calendar month, on payment of the duty and 10*l.* (x).

BOOK THE FOURTH.

OF MERCANTILE REMEDIES.

It is proposed to treat, in this Book, of Mercantile Remedies: that is, omitting all consideration of those universal ones, by action, which are open to merchants in common with the rest of her Majesty's subjects, to speak of such as are, from their very nature, exclusively, or almost exclusively, appropriated to that class of the community, with whom we are, in this Treatise, chiefly concerned.

CHAPTER I.

STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

Sect. 1. Right to stop in Transitu—what.
2. Who possesses it.
3. How long it continues
4. How defeated.
5. How exercised.

Section I.—Right to stop in Transitu—what.

Right to stop in transitu—what.

The first subject which we shall place under this head is that of Stoppage in Transitu, which is, indeed, a measure rather of prevention than of cure; but yet sufficiently entitled to the epithet remedial to justify its present collocation.

When goods are consigned on credit by one merchant to another, it sometimes happens that the consignee becomes bankrupt or insolvent (a) while the goods are on their way to him, and before they are delivered. In such case, as it would be hard that the goods of the consignor should be applied in payment of the debts of the consignee, the former is allowed by law to resume possession (c) of them, if he can succeed in doing so while they are on their way, and before they have got into the purchaser's possession. This resumption is called stoppage in transitu (d), and the doctrine of stoppage in transitu has always been construed favourably to the unpaid vendor (e). Insolvency is understood generally by merchants as having a popular and not a technical meaning, and it has been frequently construed by the Courts in its larger sense. The term insolvency (when used with reference to this branch of the law) is satisfied by general inability to pay, evidenced by stoppage of payment. In Biddlecombe v. Bond (f), it was held in a contract to mean general inability to pay debts. It seems that there is no necessity that the vendee should have become bankrupt, or that a receiving order should have been made against him, but that general inability to pay, evidenced by stoppage of payment, is sufficient (g). Mere failure by the vendee to comply with a condition subsequent, as the sending, in accordance with the contract, of a banker's draft for the price, does not give the vendor the right to resume possession after the property has vested in the vendee (h).

(a) For history of the right, see Lord Abinger's judgment in Gibson v. Carruthers, 8 M. & W. 321. In Wilmshurst v. Bowker, 2 M. & G. at p. 812, Tindal, C. J., says, "The ordinary right of countermanding the actual delivery of goods shipped to a consignee is limited to the cases in which the bankruptcy or insolvency of the consignee has taken place."

(c) See The Tigress, 32 L. J. Adm. 97.

(d) In former editions it was said that this right "was first allowed by equity," alluding to Wiseman v. Vandeput (1690), 2 Vern. 203; Snee v. Prescott, 1 Atk. 246, and D'Aquila v. Lambert, 2 Eden, 75; Ambl. 399. But the right seems to have existed as part of the lex mercatoria: Blackburn on Sale, 2nd ed., p. 318.

Right to stop in transitu—what.

Whether its effect be or be not to dissolve the contract of sale between the consignor and consignee of the goods stopped, has been much discussed (i). Lord Kenyon was of opinion that it did not rescind the sale, but was an "equitable (j) lien, adopted by the law for the purposes of substantial justice" (k); an opinion which certainly consists best with the decisions which have taken place, that payment of part of the price (unless the contract be apportionable (l)), or acceptance of a bill for the whole of it, by the vendee, will not defeat the vendor's right to stop in transitu, if the vendee become insolvent before the remainder of the price has been liquidated, or the bill taken up (m), and that the vendor is not, when he stops in transitu, obliged to tender back a bill he has received on account of the price (n). "The buyer's right," said his Lordship, "in respect of the price is not a mere lien, which he will forfeit if he parts with the possession, but grows out of his original ownership and dominion. If the seller has despatched the goods to the buyer, and insolvency occurs, he has a right, in virtue of his original ownership, to stop them in transitu.—Why? Because the property is vested in the buyer, so as to subject him to the risk of any accident, but he has not an indefeasible right to the possession; and his insolvency, without payment of the price, defeats that right. And if this be the case after he has despatched the goods, and whilst they are in transitu, à fortiori is it when he has never parted with the goods, and when no transitus has begun? The buyer, or those who stand in his place, may still obtain the right of possession, if they will pay or tender the price; or they may still act upon their right of property, if anything unwarrantable is done to that right. If, for instance, the original vendor sell when he ought not, they may bring a special action against him for the injury they sustain by such wrongful sale, and recover damages to the extent of that injury; but they can maintain no action in which the right of property and right of possession are both requisite, unless they have both those rights." tion of the nature of a vendor's lien for his price, wide enough to include the right of stoppage in transitu, and seemingly opposed to the idea that the exercise of that right operates as a rescission of the contract of sale. In Edwards v. Brewer (p), Parke, B., says, "the effect is the same as if the consignor had not delivered them on board ship. Then, if so, he has a right to retain them till payment of the whole price." There is now a general consensus of opinion that the effect of stoppage in transitu is not to rescind the contract (q).

In Vertue v. Jewell (r), Lord Ellenborough held that although the vendee may have become insolvent, still if the state of his accounts with the vendor be such that the vendor is, upon the whole, indebted to the vendee, he cannot stop in transitu goods of less value consigned to the vendee, on account of the balance; for the delivery of them to the vendee's representatives can, in that case, be productive of no injustice; and if the balance against him be occasioned by the vendee being under acceptances for his accommodation, he cannot stop in transitu until the bills are paid. This view was confirmed by the Court in banc. But it has often been questioned.

In Phelps, Stokes & Co. v. Comber, 29 Ch. D. 813, at p. 821, Cotton, L. J., thus describes the right: "It is a retaking by the unpaid vendor, either on the cancellation of the contract, as some people say, or, as I should rather say, on resuming possession for the purpose of insisting on his lien for the price, at any time while the goods are in the hands of the carrier, &c." Benjamin on Sale, 4th ed. 898.

Who possesses it.

Lord Ellenborough stated, in Siffken v. Wray (s), that the person who stopped goods in transitu must not be a mere surety for their price; one, for instance, who had, at the request of the vendee, accepted bills drawn by the vendor for their purchase-money. But since the passing of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 5) this is not necessarily the case; a surety who has paid may exercise the right. In The Imperial Bank v. The London and St. Katharine's Dock Co. (t), a broker who purchased for an undisclosed principal, and who was liable to pay the payee in the event of default, was held entitled to exercise the right; and a person abroad, who, in pursuance of orders sent him by a British merchant, purchases goods, on his own credit, of others whose names are unknown to the merchant, and charges a commission on the price, is a consignor, and is entitled to stop the goods in transitu if the merchants fail while they are on their passage; for he stands in the light of a vendor, and the British merchant of his vendee (u). So is a person who consigns goods to be sold on the joint account of himself and the consignee (v). The right belongs to a buyer who resells his interest in the goods (w).

If the stoppage be made by an unauthorized person on behalf of vendor, the act must be ratified before the transit is over (x), otherwise it will not be effectual.

Section III.—How long it continues.

How long it continues.

The period during which the right to stop the goods continues is, as we have seen, co-extensive with that of their transit from the vendor to the purchaser. Hence, in cases where the propriety of a resumption of this sort is questioned, the point disputed generally is, whether, at the time of seizure by the vendor, the transit of the goods had or had not determined. Such cases always mainly depend upon their own peculiar circumstances, but the general rule to be collected from all the decisions is, that goods are to be deemed in transitu till they get into the hands of the purchaser, his servants or agents.

Most of the cases fall into the following groups:—

(a) Where the goods, after sale, remain in the possession of the vendor.—These, which are scarcely cases of stoppage in transitu, have already been discussed with reference to the Statute of Frauds; the purchaser not having acquired the actual possession, the vendor's lien exists (y).

(b) Where the goods are in the possession of a carrier, or railway company, or a general ship not belonging to or chartered by the vendee.—Goods are to be deemed in transitu so long as they remain in the possession of carriers as such, whether by water or land (z), even though such carrier may have been appointed by the consignee himself (a); and until they come into the actual or constructive possession of the consignee, who may require the goods to be delivered to him at any stage of the journey (b). How long it continues.

(c) Where the goods are in any place of deposit connected with the transmission and delivery of them.—Such goods are still in transit. Thus, if they be landed at a seaport town, and there deposited with a wharfinger appointed by the consignee to forward them by land to his own residence, while in the hands of the wharfinger they are subject to the consignor's right of stoppage (c). "Nothing is clearer than that it is not delivery to any agent which terminates the transit" (d). But the transitus is completely at an end when the goods arrive at an agent's, who is to keep them till he receives the further orders of the vendee (e). The warehouse of the intermediary may really be the warehouse of the vendee; a carrier or wharfinger may hold the goods for him. If a consignee be in the habit, with the consent of the owner, of using the warehouse of a carrier, packer, wharfinger, or other person as his own, for instance, by making it the repository of his goods, and disposing of them there, the transit will be considered as at an end when they have arrived at such warehouse (f). Where the right of stoppage in transitu is to be defeated by a constructive possession through the medium of the carrier, acts of dominion exercised by the vendee over the goods while in the carrier's hands (as, for instance, by taking samples), will not have the effect of creating such a constructive possession, unless they be accompanied by such circumstances as denote that the carrier was intended to keep, and assented to keep, the goods in the nature of an agent for custody (g).

(d) Where goods are put on board the vendee's ship.—This will be a delivery to the vendee, unless the vendor stipulates by the form of bills of lading or otherwise to the contrary, so as to show that the master is an agent for carriage, and not an agent to receive possession for the vendee (h), e.g., where goods are put on board a vessel chartered by vendee. If the charter be of the ordinary character, not operating as a demise of the ship, and not giving the charterers for the time being complete control of the ship and crew, this will not take away the vendor's right of stoppage (i).

(e) Agreement as to destination.—The vendor and vendee may agree as to the transit, as in Ex parte Watson, In re Love (j); and in this case the transit will continue until the goods reach their agreed destination.

The following observations of Bowen, L. J., in Kendal v. Marshall, Stevens & Co. (k), explain the law where no destination is named :—

"In Ex parte Watson (l), it was held that the right to stop in transitu continued, because, wherever it is part of the bargain between the vendor and the vendee that the transit shall last up to a certain time, the transit continues until that time has arrived (m). But when goods are bought to be afterwards despatched as the vendee shall direct, and it is not part of the bargain that the goods shall be sent to any particular place, in that case the transit only ends when the goods reach the place ultimately named by the vendee as their destination. In Coates v. Railton (n), several cases were cited by Bayley, J., in the course of his judgment, and the principle to be deduced from them is that, where goods are sold to be sent to a particular destination, the transitus is not at an end until the goods have reached the place named by the vendee to the vendor as their destination. One exception, at least, is to be found to the principle here laid down: the vendee can always anticipate the place of destination, if he can succeed in getting the goods out of the hands of the carrier. In that case the transit is at an end, whatever may have been said as to the place of destination, and this shows that the real test is not what is said, but what is done. But it has never been decided that where the goods have reached the place of destination named to the vendor by the vendee, to be there held by an agent to the vendee at the vendee's disposal, the right to stop continues" (o).

How long it continues.

Though goods may not have reached their ultimate destination, yet if they "have so far gotten to the end of their journey that they [wait] for new orders from the purchaser to put them again in motion, to communicate to them another substantive destination, and that without such orders they would continue stationary" (p), the transitus is at an end.

The following is an analysis of recent cases on this subject, in order of date:—

Ex parte Watson, In re Love, 5 Ch. D. 35 (1877).—Goods sold by W., a Bradford manufacturer, to L., a London merchant; L. to ship the goods to R., at Shanghai, for sale on L.'s account; W. to have lien on bills of lading and goods on transit outwards; goods packed by W.'s packer, who forwarded them by rail to London in bales marked for Shanghai, addressed to ship designated by L.; the packer, advising L. of despatch of goods, said they were "at L.'s disposal," and the railway company, advising L. of the arrival of the goods in London, told him they remained at his order, and were held by the railway company as warehousemen, at his risk, but said "will be sent to ship." Held, by Court of Appeal, that the transit was from Bradford to Shanghai. See also Rodger v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, L. R. 2 P. C. 393.

Ex parte Rosevear Clay Co., In re Cock, 11 Ch. D. 560 (1879).—Sale by Rosevear Co. to C., a merchant at Roche, near St. Austell, of 80 to 100 tons of clay at 15*s.* per ton, f. o. b. Fowey; C. agreed verbally to charter a ship to call at Fowey, to convey the clay to Glasgow to his agent there for sale; clay delivered by Rosevear Co.

It has been decided that, where part of the goods sold by one entire contract is taken possession of by the vendee, without any intention on the vendor's part of retaining the rest, but as a step towards and in progress of the delivery of the whole, that is to be deemed a taking possession of the whole (q); though it is otherwise if there were such an intention (r). It has been said that, primâ facie, a delivery of part imports an intention to deliver the whole (s). But this is open to grave doubt (t).

on board ship at Fowey, and invoice and bill of exchange for acceptance sent to C. The Rosevear Co. knew nothing as to the destination of the ship. Held, by Court of Appeal (reversing Bacon, C. J.), that vendor's right to stop existed after ship had left Fowey for Glasgow. "The mere fact that the port of destination was left uncertain, or was changed after the contract of sale, can make no difference." Per James, L. J., at p. 568. See, also, Berndtson v. Strang, L. R. 3 Ch. 588.

Kemp v. Falk, 7 App. Css. 573 (1882).—Falk, a Liverpool merchant, sold to Kiell, a London merchant, a cargo of salt at 13*s*. 5*d*. per ton, f. o. b. The salt was intended for Calcutta, and was shipped by Falk on board a vessel, chartered by Kiell, for the voyage to Calcutta. Thereupon Falk forwarded invoices and bills of lading to Kiell. The salt was consigned to W. at Calcutta. Kiell obtained from a bank an advance upon the bill of lading, and the salt was sold by W. "to arrive." Held, by the House of Lords, affirming Court of Appeal, that the transit was not at an end until the arrival of the ship at Calcutta.

Kendal v. Marshall, Stevens & Co., 11 Q. B. D. 356 (1883.)—L. bought goods of W., a merchant at Bolton, nothing being said as to the place of delivery. L. arranged with M. & Co., shipping agents and carriers at Garston in Lancashire, that the goods should be sent to them at Garston and conveyed by them to Rouen, at a through rate from Bolton to Rouen. L. then instructed W. to send the goods to M. & Co. W. sent the goods by railway to M. & Co. The railway company gave notice to M. & Co. of the arrival of the goods, and stated that they would hold the goods as warehousemen. Held by Court of Appeal (reversing the decision of Mathew, J.), that the transit was at an end when the goods came into the possession of M. & Co.

Bethell v. Clark, 20 Q. B. D. 615 (1888).—Goods were purchased by London merchants from manufacturers at Wolverhampton, the purchasers directed the vendors to consign the goods "to the 'Darling Downs,' to Melbourne, loading in the East India Docks," the vendors delivered the goods to carriers to be forwarded to the ship. Held, by Court of Appeal (affirming Mathew, J., and Cave, J.) that the transit was not at an end till the goods reached Melbourne.

How defeated.

It has been already observed, that the delivery of goods to a carrier named by the vendee, though a delivery to the vendee himself for many purposes, is not such a one as to put an end to the right to stop them in transitu; and it has been thought that the vendee, when a particular place of delivery has been appointed, cannot anticipate the regular determination of the transit by going to meet the goods upon their journey (u). This, however, as a general rule, has been much questioned and seems overruled (x). "If," said Baron Parke, in Whitehead v. Anderson (y), "the vendee take them out of the possession of the carrier into his own before their arrival, with or without the consent of the carrier, there seems to be no doubt that the transit would be at an end." But at all events, whatever may be the effect of the receipt of goods by the vendee before the regular determination of the transit, it seems clear that the vendor's right to stop them cannot be taken away by the vendee making a demand of them, while on their journey, with which the carrier, whether rightly or wrongly, refuses to comply (z). At the termination of the journey, however, if the vendee demand the goods, the carrier cannot by wrongfully detaining them, prolong the right of the vendor to stop them (a). The vendor's right also will not be defeated by the exercise of any claim against the consignee, such, for instance, as process of foreign attachment at the suit of a creditor of the vendee (b), or the carrier's claim of a general lien for the balance due to him by the vendee (c), or (generally speaking) by his vendee's selling them again to a third party, the ordinary rule of law being that the second vendee of a chattel cannot stand in a better situation than his vendor (d). Purchasers on credit of a cargo of salt consigned it abroad to W. M. & Co. They obtained upon the security of the bills of lading an advance from a bank. The consignees sold the goods "to arrive" to sub-purchasers, to whom they were delivered. On the purchasers going into liquidation, the seller gave notice to the master, after the sub-sale but before delivery and payment of the freight, to stop the goods in transitu. It was contended that the sub-sale displaced the right of stoppage. "But," said Lord Selborne, "the original purchaser can transfer no greater or better right than he has; and the right which he has is a right subject to a stoppage in transitu, in all cases in which the right of stoppage in transitu remains in favour of the original seller of the goods" (e). We have, however, seen that the negotiation of a bill of lading for valuable consideration (f) will defeat the vendor's right to stop in transitu (g); and the Factors Act, 1889, as we have also seen (h), confers similar efficacy on the transfer of documents of title (i).

It must, however, be observed that the negotiation of a bill of lading or other instrument by way of pledge, defeats only the legal right to stop in transitu; for, in equity, the vendor may, by giving notice to the pledgee, resume his former interest in the goods, subject to the pledgee's claim, and will be entitled to the residue of their proceeds after the pledgee's demand has been satisfied out of them, or to the goods themselves, if it be satisfied aliunde, notwithstanding the pledgee may have other demands against the consignee (k). The indorsement, therefore, of a bill of lading as a pledge for a specific sum, though it transfers the property in the goods, will only bar the right of the consignor to stop in transitu to that extent. "It [the right of stoppage] is a qualified right in the circumstances which I have mentioned; because it cannot be asserted as against the holder of the bill of lading without paying him off; but the instant his claim is discharged it is exactly the same right as if there had been no security as against the original purchaser, and as against, in my opinion, everyone claiming under him" (l). The vendor may recover from the indorsee the difference between the sum for which the pledge was made and the sum realised by their sale, although the indorsee has other claims upon the consignee (m). How defeated.

Section V.—How exercised.

A consignor who is desirous, and who has a right, to stop his goods in transitu, is not obliged to make an actual seizure of them while upon their road; it is sufficient to give notice (n) to the carrier or other person in whose hands they are, on the delivery of which notice it becomes that person's duty to retain the goods; so that if he afterwards, by mistake, deliver them to the vendee, the vendor may bring trover for them, even against the vendee's assignees, if he himself have become bankrupt (o); and the carrier who, after the receipt of such a notice, delivers the goods to the vendee, is guilty of a tortious act, for which he may, of course, be held responsible (p). This right to stop extends, not only to countermand delivery to the vendee, but to require re-delivery to the vendor, who may, therefore, at once demand the goods (q). The notice must, however, that it may How exercised.

be effectual, be given to the person who has the immediate custody of the goods: if given to a principal whose servant has such custody, it must be given at such a time, and under such circumstances, that the principal, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, may communicate it to his servant in time to prevent the delivery to the consignee (r). It has been stated by Lord Blackburn, that it is the duty of the shipowner who receives such a notice to forward it to the master (s): "I had always myself understood that the law was, that when you became aware that a man, to whom you had sold goods which had been shipped, had become insolvent, your best way, or at least a good way, of stopping them in transitu, was to give notice to the shipowner in order that he might send it on. He knew where his master was likely to be, and he might send it on; and I have always been under the belief that although such a notice, if sent, cast upon the shipowner who received it an obligation to send it on with reasonable diligence, yet if, though he used reasonable diligence, somehow or other the goods were delivered before it reached, he would not be responsible. I have always thought that a stoppage, if effected thus, was a sufficient stoppage in transitu."

LIEN.

SECT. 1. Lien—what.
2. How acquired.
3. How lost.
4. Maritime Liens.

SECTION I.—Lien—what.

Lien—what.

A POSSESSORY lien (a) is a right to retain property until a debt due to the person retaining has been satisfied (b). It is not incompatible with a right on the part of the person claiming it to sue for the same debt; but he is allowed to do so, retaining his lien as a collateral security (c). There are two species of liens known to the common law, viz., Particular and General. Particular liens are where persons claim to retain the goods in respect of which the debt arises; and these are favoured by the law. General liens are claimed in respect of a general balance of account; and these are to be taken strictly (d). Where a lien exists, it is available, although the debt for which the party retaining claims to hold the goods be of more than six years'
